The preachers at Westminster Abbey last Sunday were the Dean (officiating for the West London Mission) and Canon Rowsell; and for the remaining Sundays in this month will be as follow:—On the 8th, at ten, Canon Rowsell; at three, Archbishop of Canterbury; on the 15th, at ten, Dr. Troutbeck; at three, Canon Rowsell; on the 22nd, at ten, Rev. L. E. Shelford, Vicar of St. Matthew's, Upper Clapton; at three, Canon Rowsell.

A large collection of geological curiosities, consisting principally of mineral specimens from Cumberland, Devonshire, and Wales, has been presented to the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury Cathedral by the Rev. J. J. S. Sparrow, of Willesborough, Kent, as a memorial of his brother, by whom the collection was made. The specimens, which will, when properly arranged, be of much interest and value to students of mineralogy, have been deposited in the Cathedral library.

The Rev. Edward King, who has been appointed to succeed Dr. Wordsworth in the Bishopric of Lincoln, is the son of Archdeacon King, and graduated at Oriel College, Oxford, in 1851, taking his M.A. degree in 1855. He was ordained deacon in 1854, and priest in 1855, by the late Bishop Wilberforce; and for four years was Curate of Wheatley, the parish adjacent to Cuddesdon. In 1858 he became Chaplain of Cuddesdon College, Canon Liddon at that time being the Vice-Principal; and five years later became Principal. He was appointed Regius Professor of Pastoral Theology and Canon of Christ Church in 1873.

The Archbishop of York yesterday week unveiled a statue of the late Mr. Christopher Bushell, in the museum, William Brown-street, Liverpool. The sculptor is Mr. Bruce Joy, of London. The Archbishop said the city owed it to Mr. Bushell that the School Board system of education had worked so well there. But there was no limit to his sympathies and good works. When he was satisfied that anything was good for the town in which he lived, he was ready to promote it. He was not a man of ambition, but most humble; and nothing could be more admirable than his character. His great reward, as he said himself, in doing good was that it brought him in contact with good, and it raised his own character. Let the young men of the future, who saw this statue, try to follow Mr. Bushell's example. Dean Howson mentioned that a scholarship was to be founded in University College in honour of Mr. Bushell.

The Very Rev. E. H. Bickersteth, who was installed as Dean of Gloucester only a few days ago, has accepted the see of Exeter, in succession to Dr. Temple, translated to London. Mr. Bickersteth was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was Chancellor's English medallist in 1844 and the two following years. He graduated with honours in 1847, and took his M.A. degree in 1850. He was ordained deacon in 1848, and priest in 1849, by the late Bishop of Norwich, and was appointed Vicar of Christ Church, Hampstead, in 1855. The new prelate was Chaplain to the Bishop of Ripon in 1857, and before his nomination to Hampstead successively held the curacies of Bannngham, Norfolk, and Christ Church, Tunbridge Wells, and the rectory of Hinton Martell, Dorset. He is the author of several religious works, including "The Spirit of Life," "Water from the Well-Spring," "The Rock of Ages," and many others which have been widely read beyond the limits of the northern London parish where he has so assiduously laboured during the last thirty years.

The Archbishop of York presented the scholarships and rewards given by the Liverpool Council of Education to successful scholars in the elementary schools of that city, on Thursday week. His Grace discussed the question whether we were right in bestowing so much time and education on Latin or Greek, or were there some other studies by cultivating which we might at the same time cultivate the human mind. He pointed out that the modern scheme of knowledge had so very much increased that the relations of Greek and Latin to the rest of the curriculum of studies must be changed somewhat by the mere fact that knowledge had been so increased and multiplied upon the earth. Science was a branch of education that in these days could not be neglected. It was impossible also to dispense with the study of languages. It had been suggested that, as a general rule, Latin and French might be substituted for Latin and Greek, and to those he would add another tongue not studied by the people, and that was English. It was perfectly monstrous that there should be a system of education in which Latin and Greek were taught but not English.

Dr. Temple, Bishop of Exeter, has been appointed to the see of London, in succession to the late Dr. Jackson. Dr. Temple, born in 1821, was educated at the Grammar School, Tiverton, and Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1842, and took a double first-class. After acting for some time as Principal of the Training College at Kneller Hall, he became an inspector of schools, and was subsequently Head Master of Rugby from 1858 till his appointment to the Bishopric of Exeter in 1869. Dr. Temple wrote the first of the celebrated "Essays and Reviews," published in 1860, and his authorship led to a strong opposition being made to his appointment to the episcopal bench, and counsel were employed by a portion of the clergy, who felt strongly on the subject, to oppose his election. This feeling, however, soon died away. During the time he has presided over the see, great progress has been made in Church work, and he took great interest in the formation of the Bishopric of Truro, giving up a considerable portion of his income for that purpose.

Dr. Temple presided yesterday week at the annual meeting of the Exeter branch of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and, in replying to a vote of thanks, said: "I am soon to leave this diocese. I do not expect at my age now that I can have another period of work so happy as that which I have experienced in Exeter, for nothing could be kinder than the friendship I have everywhere met with, and nothing could be more to my very heart than the way in which the whole diocese has responded to everything I have endeavoured to do in the service of the Church or for the good of my fellow-creatures since I have been here. I go because it appears to me I have no right to refuse such a call. I go to heavier work than I have had to do, but with much less chance of being surrounded with such friends as I have found here. Certainly I should not make the change at all if I did not think it an imperative duty to the Church to obey the summons I have received. But for the rest of my life never shall I forget the county of Devon or the city of Exeter, and those in them from whom I have constantly received such kindness" (Cheers).

ST. ANDREW'S UNIVERSITY.

Lord Reay, the Governor-elect of Bombay, was installed as Lord Rector of St. Andrew's University yesterday week. The ceremony drew to the ancient city the most distinguished assembly which has been present upon such an occasion at St. Andrew's.

Previous to the installation, the Senatus of the University conferred the honorary degree of LL.D. upon the following:—Lord Reay, the Marquis of Lorne, the Earl of Elgin, the Earl of Dalhousie, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl of Rosebery, the Hon. Geo. Waldegrave Leslie, the Right Hon. Sir Richard Cross, Sir George Young, President of London University; Mr. Robert Anstruther Dalyell, Vice-President of the Indian Council; the Rev. Alex. Stewart, Ballachulish; Dr. John Duncan, Edinburgh; Dr. Wm. S. Playfair, Principal Peterson, Dundee University; Mr. W. L. Courtney, Fellow of New College, Oxford; Professor Ray Laukester, Mr. Arthur James Balfour, M.P., Mr. Wm. J. H. Lecky, London; Mr. John B. Balfour, Lord Advocate; Mr. James A. Campbell, M.P.; and Mr. Andrew Lang, late Fellow of Merton College, Oxford.

Degrees of D.D. were also conferred upon the Right Rev. Charles Wordsworth, Bishop of St. Andrews; the Right Rev. Frederick Temple, Bishop of Exeter, Bishop-designate of London; the Rev. Henry Allon, Islington; the Rev. J. D. Geden, Professor of Hebrew, Didsbury College; and the Rev. Emilie Comba, Professor in the Waldensian College, Florence. Most of the above noblemen and gentlemen were present.

Lord Reay's rectorial address referred exclusively to the question of University reform. He urged the Scottish Universities to aim at a high standard of teaching, and especially to equip themselves with scientific appliances. They ought also to throw open their divinity chairs to the best men.

Lord Rosebery, after complimenting Lord Reay upon his address, remarked that he thought his Lordship placed too much importance upon State aid as a necessary element in the development of Scotch education. With or without aid from the Treasury, education and the Scotch people would not be kept apart.

THE GERMAN HOSPITAL.

At the annual general meeting of the governors, donors, subscribers, and supporters of this institution, held last week at the City Terminus Hotel, Cannon-street, Baron von Schroder (treasurer) was the chairman. The report showed that the hospital had carried on during the year, without interruption, and to its full extent, all its duties. The number of in-patients during the year was 1822, of whom 353 were cases of accidents, most of them English: 45 were admitted into the sanitarium, 351 gained admission into the convalescent home at Dalston, and as many as 34 were sent to the Convalescent Hospital at Eastbourne. The number of out-patients last year was as follows:—At the Hospital Dispensary (including 2001 cases of accidents treated as out-patients, three-fourths of them being English), 15,921; at the Eastern Dispensary of the institution, 3991; at the Western, 1760; dental cases, 1003: making a total (together with 1822 in-patients) of 24,500. Of the usual sources of income the principal one had again been the anniversary dinner, which, besides £200 annual subscription from the Emperor of Germany, had yielded the amount of £2935. With sincere gratitude, it was added, the following, amongst other donations given on the occasion of the last anniversary banquet, were acknowledged:—A donation of £50 from the Emperor of Austria, £20 from the King of Bavaria, £20 from the Grand Duke of Hesse, 150 marks from each of the Ducal Governments of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha and of Brunswick-Lonsburg, and £50 from the Senate of Hamburg.

The appointment of Mr. Richard Faulknor Curry, M.A., Christ Church, Oxford, to be one of her Majesty's inspectors of schools has been gazetted.

The Lady Mayoress holds afternoon receptions at the Mansion House on the first and third Tuesdays in each month, from three to five.

Hospital Sunday in Sheffield, in aid of the medical charities of the town, realised over £2000, and it is expected that further returns will increase the amount.

Mr. C. Scotter, goods manager of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway, has been elected general manager of the London and South-Western Railway.

Mr. E. Lewis Thomas, B.A., of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and Lincoln's-inn, has been appointed executive officer of the Mansion House Council on the Dwellings of the People.

The Company of Drapers have given twenty guineas, the Company of Merchant Taylors ten guineas, and the Company of Armourers and Brasiers three guineas, to the Homes for Working Girls in London. These Homes are intended for girls and young women who are employed in the factories and workrooms of the metropolis, accommodating 345.

Mr. John Walker, of Cornhill, has completed for the Government of Western Australia four massive gold hunting chronometer watches for presentation to Lance-Corporal of Police John McKenna, David Kilpatrick, William Smith, and Edmund Horace Smith, on account of gallant conduct on Sept. 16, 1884.

The steamer Gulf of Mexico, of 2059 tons, Captain Allan, chartered by Sir Saul Samuel, K.C.M.G., Agent-General for New South Wales, sailed from Plymouth for Sydney on the 27th ult., with a total of 582 emigrants, under the supervision of Dr. L. R. Huxtable as surgeon-superintendent, Miss Chicken being in charge of the single women.—The steam-ship Duke of Sutherland sailed from Gravesend on the 28th ult. with the following passengers for Queensland:—Second cabin, 21 adults, equal to 26 souls; emigrants, 181 single men, 43 single women, and married couples and children equal to 621 adults.

The Birmingham Musical Association have issued a report of the association during the past season. Twenty-four concerts have been given, exceeding by one the number given in the preceding season. The total number of persons attending during the season was 56,613, giving an average of 2358, or 133 less than the preceding season. The average receipts for the season were £42 per concert. The Executive Committee state that from an educational point of view the frequent rehearsals of both band and chorus are of great value, and the fact that members of the association band have been appointed to positions in local professional orchestras may be regarded as a proof that valuable technical experience is gained which could probably not be otherwise acquired.

LITERARY BIOGRAPHY.

The publication of Mr. Cross's "Life of George Eliot" suggests a topic which to all lovers of literature is of no slight interest. There was a time when it was taken for granted that the life of a literary person must necessarily have little attraction for the general reader. In the biographies of this class published during the last century, the writer frequently begins his work by saying that since the life he is about to record was spent chiefly in the study and in the society of men of learning, since there occurred in it no desperate incidents of field or flood, since the hero of the book neither led armies in the field nor legislators in the House of Commons, it is evident that the story of his career will be valued chiefly by men following the same pursuits. And, judging from several of these narratives which we have had the misfortune to read, it would seem as if the chief purpose of the biographers was to cultivate dullness. They leave out all the suggestive details which bring up a man's presence before us, and indulge in platitudes and moral reflections. So anxious are they to be dignified that they put human nature aside, and show that if there be a stupidity due to ignorance, there is also a stupidity which belongs to learning. For instance—Dr. Joseph Warton, editor of Pope, and head master of Winchester College for more than a quarter of a century, was a man important enough, perhaps, to deserve a memoir, and his friend, the Rev. John Wooll, undertook to write it. The honest man, who is careful to give his views of the biographical art, observes that "to descend to the minutiæ of daily habits is surely beneath the province of biography," and adds that the reader must not expect "a detail of those peculiarities and trifling incidents which are by some indiscriminately termed strokes of character"—the result being that when the reader has waded through the big volume, he will be of opinion that Joseph Warton resembles the women described by Pope who have no character at all.

The modern biographer, it must be admitted, does not generally err on this side. He is liable to relate too much about his hero, rather than too little; to insert what is essentially unimportant, and to amplify facts which are of trifling significance. In the hands, indeed, of such masters of the art as Boswell and Lockhart, Southey and Mr. Trevelyan, the minutest detail is not without its value; not because it is significant when standing alone, but because, like a subtle stroke of the painter's brush, it gives expression and completeness to the portrait. To know how to use small incidents, and at the same time how to avoid what is really trivial, is an indication that at least in one respect the writer understands his art. Nor is it always the intrinsic value of a subject that entitles it to a prominent place in a biography. It is not needed there if it does not illustrate character and contribute to the progress of the narrative. The way in which some memoir-writers will foist in topics that have no essential connection with the lives they are writing, shows that they are incapable of appreciating literary form. And yet there can be no doubt that this form is the salt which preserves a book from corruption. Memoirs are frequently what George Eliot calls them—"A string of mistakes." The writers may fail from having no style, from the want of any sense of proportion, from insufficient reticence on the one hand, from the fear of being too familiar on the other. They may be too regardless of the feelings of contemporaries, and too prone to exalt a hero at their expense. Perhaps the greatest defect of a biographer—and are not all other defects summed up in it?—is the want of vision. If the artist does not properly see what he is painting, the features must be blurred; if he sees but one feature perfectly, it is inevitable that he should distort the rest; if too short-sighted to see beyond the facial lines of his subject, how can he represent faithfully that which lies around him and beyond?

It is comparatively easy to say what a biography ought to be, and "if to do were as easy as to know what were good to be done," lives would rank with the most delightful literature in the language. The best of knowledge is the knowledge of great and good men who have lived and died before us. We learn from their failings as much almost as from their virtues; some of their strength we gain for conflict, some of their patience for endurance, some of their courage for manly acts. It is possible to read a book of abstract science, or of moral reflection, without gaining one whit more capacity for daily duties than we had before; but what man or woman can read the biographies of Johnson and Scott, of Arnold and Kingsley, of Macaulay and Bishop Patti'son, without gaining larger views of the possibilities of life and stronger incentives to exertion? Carlyle said that biography is the only history, and certainly the more the historian can bring human beings before us in his pages the more capable are we of understanding the meaning of events. The task, however, is one of the highest difficulty. It is easier to describe what may be called mass movements than individual action. The public acts of a great statesman can be readily chronicled, but endeavour to present a truthful picture of the man himself, and the probability of failure is considerable. Do you doubt this? Then try to draw a characteristic likeness of some person with whom you are in constant intercourse, and who lives under the same roof; you will probably succeed very partially, if at all. Yet, for the most part, the biographer must work out his materials without having enjoyed this advantage. It is calculated that not more than two years and six months of Dr. Johnson's long life were spent by Boswell in his society. The opportunities of most biographers are even less, and few men know how to make use of them as Boswell did. The greater the difficulty, the greater the glory, and to write a really fine biography secures to the author at once a distinguished place in literature. Yes, a really fine biography; but, rich as is our literature in other departments, the principal achievements in this line of literary art may be easily counted on the fingers.

THE RELIEF OF KHARTOUM.—FROM KORTI TO METAMMEH, ON

THE ROAD TO KHARTOUM: THE START ACROSS THE DESERT

SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. MELTON PRIOR.

THE OLDEST INHABITANT.

The soft grey mist blows along the tops of the hills, and a south-west wind is rollicking up the valley, where a thousand tiny rills of water are running musically along and singing loudly of the coming spring-time. Away beyond the garden, the rooks are quarrelling and consulting about the state of preservation in which their nests are after the winter; while an occasional jackdaw puts in a word, that is promptly cawed down, when he sails off, a little rebuffed, towards his own residence in the old ruined castle near by, that only requires a few more straws to be ready for use the moment he has made up his mind to begin housekeeping once more.

Already the birds have begun to sing just a little in the early morning; a faint brown hue is dawning on the willows in the hollow; in the hedge-sides that are least exposed to the weather, the hard, black look that characterises winter is giving place to the purple flush of life that means spring; and in the garden the first snowdrop dances enthusiastically in the breeze, and challenges the primroses to a game, regardless that they are only just peeping from their warm green leaves, as if they were not quite so confident that the cold weather had really gone as are the snowdrops and the gold and purple crocuses that are making quite a show in the south border under the window—where, year in and year out, sits, placidly knitting and looking out into the calm world of the country, our dear kind friend, the oldest inhabitant of this distant shire.

The scent of the violets is strong in the air, and the sun is really driving away the mists, and so, rising with our help from her chair, and leaning on our arm, we persuade her to take her quiet daily walk in the dear old garden; and, as we wander up and down, she looks with her keen blue eyes over the scenery, and owns it is as fair a morning as any she has seen in the one hundred years and six months that have been her portion, so far, in this sublunary sphere; where she intends, if all be well, to continue in health and good spirits for as much longer as it will please Providence to leave her to enjoy her life.

It is such a calm, even flow of life, too, now, that we, impetuously inclined to be up and doing, taking our part in the rush and hurry of the world at large, cannot help wondering why she cares to continue what is at the best surely only mere existence. Imbued with the nineteenth-century idea that a day passed without seeing or doing something new is a day lost, we venture to say as much. We mention that from her windows can be seen little save the procession of the seasons; the birth of a year that must surely die when winter walks the land; that to her home comes nothing, save, may be, news of the death of someone whose grandparents were her own familiar friends. But she only smiles calmly at our unrest and our questionings, and declares that she is satisfied, and requires nothing so long as she can look out at the garden, planted and arranged by her and her young husband now nearly eighty years ago. As she mentions him, her figure straightens, and a smile comes on her aged face; and, pointing with her stick, she shows us the design of the house: how it was made to face south, and yet so that it should not receive the full strength of the winds that came from the sea, often filling the valley with mist; and how the walls were made double and then filled up with cement, mixed and poured in, so that they should be strong, and able to keep out the heat of summer and the cold in winter, in a manner that would appear wonderful indeed to the builders of the present day, whose one idea is hurry and how to give as little as they can in return for the money they obtain. And then she points beyond the garden, and shows us where she met her husband first, in the early years of the century, when Waterloo was yet unfought, and Bonaparte was the dread and fear of the simple villagers, who expected his landing daily on their coast, and never went to bed without dreaming of what might happen before the day once more dawned, with its comparative security.

It is like a page out of a very old book to listen to her, as she slowly paces that narrow garden-path, curiously bordered with the bones of cows' feet in a peculiar pattern that surely was never seen elsewhere, and talks to us of all she has seen and heard.

Her placid voice is as peaceful as her whole life appears to be now; and we can hardly believe she has really lived over all the trials and troubles that have been hers, and existed through the stream of events that racked the outside world, and that only ruffled the mere edge of life so far from London was her home before the date of railways.

Still, she tells us of her own love-story, redolent of lavender and other old-world scents that hang about the love-letters bound together with a soft purple ribbon, that replaced the pink one of her youth when her venerable husband went to his rest in the churchyard near by, that we can see from the parlour window. She shows us a tiny shoe, belonging to the first baby, who died, too, almost before he had opened his eyes on this quiet corner of the world; and she smiles as she does so, because she still can knit the same shoes now, and has lost all the bitter sense of loss, keeping nothing but the bright side of the memory of an infant that she confidently expects to see as soon as ever she has ceased to be in her body; the while she turns over the drawers in the old oak cabinet, and shows us letters of invitation, apologising for the lateness of the hour that is mentioned, and giving as an excuse that "Mr. Audrey cannot get back from the justices' meeting" before half-past three, and therefore dinner must perforce be at four o'clock.

That these dinners were important functions is shown by the fact that each invitation has been carefully kept, as if it were a state document; and as she tells us of the long sitting over the mahogany, of the toasts drunk, and of the ladies retiring, to be joined no more by the gentlemen, who had generally to be fished out from under the table and conveyed home, we are glad, indeed, the good old times have vanished, and it is no longer considered the thing to consume two bottles of port, and to be carried back insensible to one's house, as a proof of the strength of the wine and the excellence of the hospitality that has been enjoyed by the guests.

In her early days, china plates were rare possessions, and pewter services were in general use; dresses were carefully selected, after much consultation among friends and neighbours, from stalls held by "London mercers" at the biennial fairs in the neighbouring town, that were the great events looked forward to by old and young alike, and that now are almost improved off the face of the world. The post came occasionally, walking leisurely across the valley, when the spirit moved him, which was not often; and letters used to be fetched on market-day, having often spent two or three days in the post-mistress's window, in the hope that someone would see them and take them to their destination; while a newspaper was an event, little sought after or noticed, by-the-way by, the ladies of the household, who cared little and knew less of what was going on in the world outside—Waterloo even passing unheeded, save for the facts that the beacons used no longer to be kept up, and that the post was accelerated because a local dignitary was incensed at the delay in receiving a letter that told him all about the great fight.

True, once she remembers being busy about a law-suit, the particulars of which, bound in calf, and dated 1837, read like a piece out of the Middle Ages to us, who were not born in those far-distant days; but she waxes eloquent over the details, and gives us a graphic description of producing one of the old invitations mentioned above, the formation of an S in which proved conclusively that the will was a forgery: for the propounder thereof only made his S's in one way, and this invitation was, as it happened, the only piece of his writing to be found; for she tells us, too, of the midnight burning of some of the old man's documents, that she happened to see from her window, being kept awake by a restless baby; and the conspirators, forgetting in that quiet place to draw down a concealing blind, were visible to her as she stood rocking the infant, who died at sixty some years ago. And as she takes the book from us and looks over it again, she goes inch by inch over the evidence with a lawyer's keenness, and quite forgets her age as she fights the long-ago won battle over again.

It is curious to hear our dear old friend talk, for she seems to have a stand-point entirely her own, and appears to be on an eminence from which she can look over the turmoil of our daily life, and take from it nothing save what is good and worth hearing. Enthusiastic still over the comings and goings of her descendants, she seems to hold life in an even balance, and, never expecting too much, is consequently above being disappointed, for she knows the worst and the best life can bring her; and, having outlived all the fierce agonies of love and death, she loves her quiet life, living in the past, that has lost all bitterness, and shows her nothing save pleasant pictures; and, having no sense of age, talks confidently of "next year" as if Death had passed her by, and intended to leave her with us for ever, still appreciating the proud position she enjoys to the full of being undoubtedly "the oldest inhabitant." J. E. PANTON.

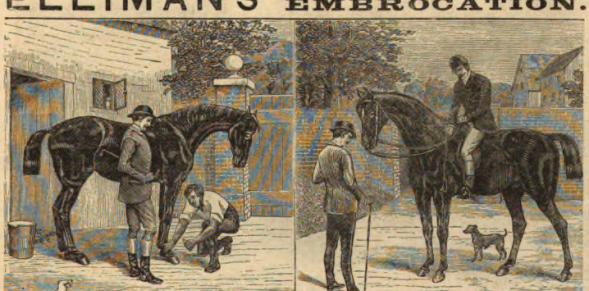
The council of the London School of Medicine for Women have received notice of a legacy amounting to nearly £700, which has been left to them by the will of the late Mr. John Byron, who wished a scholarship to be founded for the purpose of assisting ladies of limited means desiring to study medicine as profession.

The Sailors' Home at Leith, erected at a cost of £9200, was opened on Thursday week in the presence of a large company. Mr. James Currie, shipowner, chairman of the committee, gave a history of the Sailors' Home at Leith, stating that thousands annually availed themselves of the old building, whence they transmitted to relatives as much as £2000 in one year. Only £800 was wanted to clear the new building of debt. Admiral Sir Alexander Milne congratulated the committee on the erection of the building. Lord Rosebery, in expressing sympathy with the sailor, asked What was it that constituted the greatness of this country? It was not so much our laws or our Constitution. The surest outward sign of the spirit and life of the nation was the prosperity and welfare of our seafaring populations. This nation did not wish to be cooped up and hemmed in in the islands of Great Britain and Ireland, but this would be the case if our naval force was allowed to fall below its proper standard; and should, unfortunately, that moment ever arrive, he thought it would then be time to emigrate to some better and new part of the world. Great Britain might truly be called a sailors' home, and so long as they gave their sailors a home he was quite sure they need never fear for the future of this country. His Lordship then declared the Home open.

THE DEGENERATION OF LONDONERS.

Mr. James Cantlie, F.R.C.S., delivered an address at the Parkes Museum of Hygiene, on Thursday week, on "Degeneration Among Londoners." The lecturer first defined London, hygienically considered, to be a region where there was no ozone, as a place where, from either the want of light or ozone, sun-burning was unknown, and as a place where beneficial exercise—that is, exercise in the fresh air—was impossible. A Londoner was one whose father and mother were born, brought up, and lived in the area he had defined, and who was brought up and lived in London, and whose only notion of a relaxation was a run to the country or the seaside on a Bank Holiday. It was wellnigh impossible to find a third, and absolutely impossible to find a fourth, generation of pure Londoners; the progeny ceased, partly from moral and partly from physical decline and inability of continuance. The pure Londoner of the third generation, which he had been able, after much search and inquiry, to get hold of, was a picture of physical decline, involving shortness of stature, narrow chest, deformity of jaws, miserable appearance (squint prevailing), scrofulous diseases, and small head. Pure Londoners were seldom to be found in workhouses, because they died young. Entering at length into the effect of too little exercise upon young children, youths, adults, families, nations, and races, the lecturer foretold evil to the townsfolk of to-day if means were not taken to provide means of exercise in fresh air. It was a serious question whether the welfare of this country should in the next generation be left to a race out of whom all enthusiasm and earnestness had passed. Everywhere in England people were becoming more "townified," and if it were not for the fresh air of the country they would soon be reduced to the same level.

The Right Hon. W. E. Forster, M.P., has consented to take the chair at the forthcoming annual festival of the Newsvenders' Benevolent and Provident Institution, which will take place at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on March 11.



The report of the company which took over the assets of the City of Glasgow Bank has been issued. The profits for the year are £40,747. The directors recommend 4 per cent dividend, which, with 3 per cent paid last July, makes a dividend of 7 per cent for the year. These dividends absorb £35,000, leaving nearly £6000 to be carried forward. The recoveries during the year are £11,545. This sum has been added to the surplus assets, which now amount to £217,709.

At a Court of Common Council a recommendation of the Officers' and Clerks' Committee was considered that the Court should pay Mr. Roberts, late Remembrancer, £1600, and not enforce the payment of the taxed costs which he had been adjudged to pay in the actions he had brought. This recommendation was rejected by seventy-five votes to seventy. A proposal to give £1200 was also lost, and an amendment to give £1000 was carried, but afterwards rejected on being put as a substantive motion.

The President of the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce stated at the annual meeting that the general trade of the country had not been much less in bulk in 1884 than in 1883. The accumulated production of three years was beyond the demand, consequently they had to reduce it in 1884. Hence the decrease in profits. The British Empire had 80 per cent of the mercantile navy of the world, representing a value of no less than £60,000,000. The item of ships built for foreign countries was not entered in the Board of Trade returns. In thirty-one limited companies in Sheffield there had been a depreciation in value of £3,600,000, and eight other companies had an increase £1,600,000, leaving a deficit of £2,000,000. House property had deteriorated from 15 to 13 per cent, and the value of the land had gone down from 10 to 40 per cent.

The annual meeting of the Scottish Farmers' Alliance was held in Aberdeen on Thursday week—Mr. John Rae, Haddo, presiding. The annual report stated amongst the objects of the alliance was one to obtain the institution of a land court in each county in Scotland, whose principal duties shall be to regulate the conditions of occupancy on the application of either landlord or tenant, and to deal with the allocation of allotment of land for working men, both in town and country—the court to consist of three commissioners, two of whom should be practical agriculturists. The other objects are to obtain the total abolition of the game laws, so far as applicable to arable land; to have all heritable property rated at its fair annual value, whether let or unlet; to obtain the abolition of the laws of entail and primogeniture; and to secure a thorough representative system of county and parochial government for Scotland. The committee expressed their thorough satisfaction with the year's work, especially in view of the passing of the Reform Bill, showing that the legislation of the future would be directed more than hitherto to social questions. The committee refused to identify themselves with the proposal at the great meeting in Glasgow that there should be no property in land. After detailing the work of the year, the committee reported that it was suggested to alter the name of the alliance to the Scottish Land Alliance, and to make an alteration in their objects and rules, the principal of which was for the introduction of a Land Court as a final arbiter in all cases where a landlord and his tenant cannot agree on any question affecting the conditions of occupancy.

THE KHARTOUM EXPEDITION: GAKDUL WELLS.

FROM A SKETCH TAKEN ON THE SPOT BY THE LATE LORD ST. VINCENT, CAPTAIN 16TH LANCERS.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

The late Lord Lytton left behind him three unacted plays. One was founded on a classical subject, "The Captives," by Plautus; another was unfinished, but was completed, at the request of the present Peer, by Mr. Coghlan, the actor, and produced some seven or eight years ago. It is called "The House of Darnley." The third piece is "Brutus," and, although the author has been dead since 1873, the drama is only now going to see light, being in preparation for the Princess's Theatre. The hero is not Marcus Junius Brutus befriended by Cæsar, whom he afterwards conspired against; but Lucius Junius Brutus, who feigned insanity, and thereby saved his life, though his father and eldest brother were murdered by Tarquin. With the suicide of Lucretia and sudden exposure of the artifice of Brutus, there is plenty of material for strong dramatic situations; while the fame of the author and the fact that the production is posthumous, should make the event highly interesting.

Here is a significant historical reminiscence. Six hundred and ten years before the Christian era, Nechos, a king of Egypt, attempted to make a canal between the Gulf of Arabia and the Mediterranean Sea. The essay was abandoned in the following year, after costing, according to Herodotus, the lives of twelve thousand men. Another Egyptian canal, and the rights appertaining to it, seem likely to lead to the sacrifice of many more lives after the expiration of twenty-five centuries.

People have unwittingly given their names to articles which they have invented or popularised. Thus Dr. Guillotin is responsible for the instrument of execution adopted in France; and Bowie knives are so called in consequence of being made after the pattern of the hunting dagger of Colonel James Bowie. At the Exhibition in New Orleans the original implement which belonged to him is on view. No doubt it will interest many who are fond of relics, but Mr. Barnum tells a story that casts a doubt on the authenticity of this sort of thing. "A newspaper man," he says, "called on me when first I opened my great museum in New York, and after going over the building with me and admiring my exhibits, he suggested that if I could but obtain the club with which Captain Cook had been killed by the Sandwich Islanders that it would prove a great attraction. I had at the time several war clubs in a lumber-room up stairs, so, seizing on the idea, I told him that curiously enough I had secured the treasure yesterday, and that I would fetch it for his inspection. Having procured a descriptive label, I came down triumphantly, and placed the club in his hand. He turned it over and over; he almost shed tears I thought; but at length he spoke. 'Poor Cook,' he said, 'poor fellow; I'm glad you have shown me this, but I expected it. I have been to all the smaller museums in the city, and they all had it, so I felt sure that a gigantic establishment like this would not be without it.'"

As a rule, donkeys are not considered to be ornamental animals; and yet the latest Parisian craze points to the apotheosis of the ass. Donkey skin has become the favoured material for adorning ladies' costumes, and prominent portions of the beast are worn in various ways. To be in the newest fashion, one should have the ears of the obstinate beast trimmed in a bonnet of grey fur, with the same coloured velvet strings; and one young lady we have seen has gone so far as to have a huge clasp made of the fronts of two donkeys' faces, to fasten up her skirt.

At several weddings amongst the presents announced as having been received by the bride and bridegroom have been cheques for considerable sums of money. This is an example that might in many cases be advantageously followed. Frequently, young people commencing life together want certain things that their means preclude them from purchasing at first. Instead of getting one article that would really be useful, they are inundated with a dozen china vases, sets of salt-cellars, or carriage clocks. They have a natural diffidence in disposing of these, while so many are absolutely useless. Even if they could sell them and buy what they wanted, tradesmen's profits would prevent them getting full value for the goods. Had the money been given, the donor would have paid his compliment and the recipients have been doubly delighted and well served.

Hunting in England can never come in the category of cheap amusements; but it might be imagined that the joys of the chase could be thoroughly indulged in with a stud of, say, twenty horses. The Earl of Lonsdale, however, whose stables at Thrapston are probably the most beautiful and best appointed in the country, possessed over a hundred hunters. Now that the season is coming to a close, and Lord Lonsdale is giving up a portion of the woodland county he hunted, a draught of forty spirited creatures have been sent up to Tattersall's for sale. It must have been flattering to their noble owner to find that his stock fetched prices up to 400 and 500 guineas each. The purchasers, too, have this disadvantage, that there is a long enforced idleness after next month.

That the French invent what their rivals utilise has long ago passed into an aphorism, whose truth has been proved by a Parisian named Estienne. This gentleman some few years ago invented an improvement on the Morse system of telegraphy, with a new mode of writing, and several original details which give all the advantages of that system without any of its drawbacks. He submitted this invention for Government inspection, and certain official specialists recommended it most highly, but there the matter rested, and the Estienne system was not even tried. The inventor thereupon offered it to the German Government, which at once recognised its merits, and it is now used throughout the Fatherland.

Some curious details come from Paris respecting a certain Sheikh Gemal-Eddin, who is in that capital for the purpose of receiving news of the Mahdi and communicating it to the Mussulmans of India by means of a journal called Le Ralliement, which is printed in Arabic, and sent to them in parcels. According to this authority, the Mahdi may perhaps negotiate with England the exchange of Gordon for Arabi, who is popular, and of service to the cause of Mahomet. Gemal-Eddin had a share in the education of the new Prophet of Islam, and says he is about thirty-two years of age, very intelligent, a hard worker and deep thinker, very reserved, willing to listen to others, but preferring his own counsels to anyone else's. Having no official dignity, nor social position, he depends on his personal character alone. The Sheikh declares that Gordon must be alive, as the Mahdi would not dream of sacrificing him.

People speak of orchids and orchises as though they were totally different, whereas they belong to the same family known to botanists as the Orchidaceæ. Broadly speaking, our British species, such as the spotted orchis, which grows side by side with the primrose, the bee orchis of the Bonchurch downs, and the lady's tresses of the New Forest, are the tuberous and fibrous rooted Terrestrial orchids, while the rare and splendid tropical kinds that grow chiefly on other plants, adhering to their bark or rooting in the scanty soil on their surface, are called Epiphytes. Vanilla is the product of two Asiatic and six American species of climbing orchids, a couple of which, V. aromatica and V. planifortia, are said to contain so much benzoic acid and essential oil that the labourers who collect their seeds for commercial purposes become giddy, and show other symptoms of intoxication.

One of the most richly dowered brides in the world, Miss Eva Mackay, who was married in Paris on the 12th inst. to Don Fernando Colonna, Prince di Galatro, set a most refreshing example of simplicity in her wedding raiment. She wore a long plain dress of rich ivory-white satin, embroidered with orange-blossoms on silken bands. A spray of real orange-flowers at her throat, and another at the side of her dress, with a small diadem wreath on her head keeping the graceful white tulle veil in its place, were her only ornaments. Not a morsel of lace, nor a single jewel, enriched this charming toilette; but she was radiant with youth and freshness and the happiness of what seldom comes to pass in these days, a genuine love-match.

The jewels Mrs. Mackay has presented to her daughter consist of a magnificent necklace and bracelets, each containing five rows of pearls separated by diamond bars. The earrings are large pearls set with brilliants. A parure of diamonds given by both parents includes a wreath of miniature fern-leaves for hair or corsage, a comb with a similar heading of diamond foliage, solitaire, earrings, porte bonheur bracelets, and a necklace which has two rows of diamonds to go round the throat, from which fall three rows of leaves. A second pair of earrings, to go with this set, consists of two splendid rubies, set in diamonds. Mrs. Mackay is well known to have a perfect taste and discrimination in the matter of rubies, and is the owner of one of the finest in the world.

The report that a French war-correspondent, named Olivier Pain, is acting as generalissimo and universal adviser to the Mahdi may be exaggerated, but, viewed by the light of past events in the career of that eccentric journalist, is by no means impossible. Pain was Rochefort's devoted friend and coadjutor, and escaped with him from New Caledonia by swimming three miles out to a boat which conveyed them to a vessel bound for England, and they ultimately took up their abode at Geneva. When the Russo-Turkish war broke out, Pain found his way thither as military correspondent of the Bien Public, contrived to pass through the Russian lines, and reached Plevna, where he speedily ingratiated himself with Osman Digna. Before long, he exchanged the pen for the sword, and fought as a Turkish artilleryman. Being taken in that uniform after a Russian defeat, he was taken to Sizerane, on the banks of the Volga, and closely guarded in prison. Here he was told that his trial was approaching and he would certainly be shot, and wrote telling his father his impending fate. The old man sent the letter to Rochefort at Geneva, and he lost no time in persuading the Chancellor of the Swiss Republic and the Minister of the Interior to telegraph to St. Petersburg and claim his friend as a Swiss citizen.

The matter being brought before the late Czar, he decided that there was no case against Pain; and, though he had fought on the Turkish side, a journalist must choose his own mode of carrying on his vocation. The Communist was therefore permitted to depart, and within a month he reached Geneva in his dirty ragged Turkish uniform, and with a fez by way of head-dress. The amnesty followed before very long, and Pain returned to Paris, where he has earned his living ever since by writing for the various papers. When our troops were ordered to the Soudan, his old love of adventure returned, and he proposed to the Figaro that he should join the Mahdi's camp, an offer which was too good not to be accepted. He accomplished his purpose, and forwarded two or three articles, which were duly published. No more was heard from him, and it was presumed that he had gone so far into the interior as to be unable to communicate with France, until a few days ago, when a rumour from a Governmental source announced that he had participated in the taking of Khartoum, and had become the Mahdi's Minister of Foreign Affairs. In this, as in so many other cases, we can only acquiesce in the dictum that truth is stranger than fiction.

Mr. Phil Morris, A.R.A., has always been strong in baby pictures, and is said to have prepared four or five for the forthcoming exhibition at Burlington House. One or two of them are nude studies; another represents Edward I. showing the first Prince of Wales to the Cymri at Carnarvon; and a very striking one is called "Foster-Sisters," and shows a child born in the purple side by side with a child of the gutter.

ANOTHER GREAT BATTLE IN EGYPT.

OUR SUCCESS COMPLETE.

DEATH OF GENERAL EARLE AND COLONEL EYRE.

FROM GENERAL LORD WOLSELEY TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR.

(Received Feb. 12, dated Korti, Feb. 11, 11.50 p.m.)

The following telegram just received from General Brackenbury:—Dulka Island is about seventy miles above Merawi. The attack was well planned and gallantly executed, and I expect its effect will be to open the way without further fighting to Berber. Message begins:—

"Camp opposite Dulka Island, Feb. 10.—Having found enemy in position stated in telegram No. 98, of 9th inst., General Earle concentrated Staffords and Black Watch here yesterday, reconnoitered the position, and this morning advanced to attack it. They held a high ridge of razor-backed hills and some advanced koppies in front, close to the river. Two companies Stafford and two guns being left under Colonel Aldeyne to hold the enemy in front, we marched with six companies Stafford and six companies Black Watch round the high range of hills, entirely turning the enemy's position, which we attacked from the rear. The enemy's numbers were not great, but their position was extremely strong and difficult of access, and they fought with most determined bravery.

"The Black Watch advanced over rocks and broken ground upon the koppies, and after having by their fire in the coolest manner driven off a rush of the enemy, stormed the position under a heavy fire. General Earle was among the foremost in this attack, and to the deep sorrow of every officer and man in the force was killed on the summit of the koppie. The Staffords attacked the high ridge, and over the most difficult ground it was possible for troops to advance upon, carried the position. In this attack their gallant commanding officer, Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, was killed. Meanwhile, the squadron 19th Hussars, under Colonel Butler, swept round to the rear and captured the enemy's camp. Our success is complete. We have captured ten standards, and the whole of the position is in our hands. It is difficult to estimate the enemy's loss, but their dead are lying thick among the rocks and in the open, where, when they found themselves surrounded, they tried to rush through our troops. Scarcely any can have escaped.

"Our own loss is as follows:—Major-General Earle; Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, South Staffords; Brevet-Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny, Royal Highlanders; one corporal and three privates Royal Highlanders; three privates South Staffordshire, and two Egyptian Camel Corps missing. One private Royal Highlanders. Wounded very severely: Brevet-Lieut.-Colonel Wauchope, Royal Highlanders. Severely wounded: Captain Horsbrugh, Staffords; Lieutenant Hon. J. G. R. Colborne, Staffords; Lieutenant T. Kennedy, Royal Highlanders. Wounded: Twenty non-commissioned officers and men Stafford, and eighteen Black Watch. List will follow with written report by special messenger.

"Prisoners report enemy led by Moussa Wad Abuhegel, Ali Wad Aussein, cousin of Lekalik; and Hamid Wad Lekalik, brother of Lekalik. All these are reported killed. The enemy said to have consisted of the Monassir, with some Robatab and a force of Dervishes from Berber.

"Our advance by river will be continued to-morrow at daylight, and I shall endeavour to carry out your instructions to General Earle, with which I am fully acquainted."

The War Office is prepared to accept the services of a limited number of Officers belonging to the Militia and Reserve for temporary service with the departments of the Army. Application for employment should be addressed to the Military Secretary, Horse Guards, War Office. All Officers of the Reserve who have not kept the Military Secretary informed of their addresses are requested to do so at once.

War teaches us geography and leads to the invention of new names for new things, enriching languages with new words, such as mitrailleur or mitrailleuse (between which two forms writers seem to be divided); and such as "loot," which came to us from our Indian campaigns, &c. We have now "camelry," for a body of soldiers mounted on camels, and it remains to be seen whether the new term will assert itself permanently. Our Irish troubles have given us "boycott," as one of our murderers is said to have given us "burke." Our explosions have given us "dynamitard"; to our billiards we are indebted for "cueist." Our "fast" life has given us "masher"; but that will no doubt fall into desuetude, like "macaroni," like "buck," and like similar terms. It appears to be a mere chance whether a new word will "stick" or not. Sometimes even an invention of the "euphuists," or the "affected" school, which was laughed to scorn at first, meets with ultimate acceptance and establishes itself for ever. Nobody now would tell a servant seriously in English to "agitate the tintinnabulator"; but anybody might say in French, when speaking of somebody who has got into low company, "il s'encanaille." Yet we know that, when Molière wrote, the expression was considered ridiculous, and worthy of Mademoiselle De Scudéry in her most extravagant mood, such as would prompt her to command the snuffing of a candle in the following "tall" language: "retranchez le superflu de cet ardent."

THE KHARTOUM EXPEDITION.

FALL OF KHARTOUM.

A painful revulsion of feeling was caused last week by the news published on Thursday morning that Khartoum, instead of being "relieved" by the gallant advance of Sir Herbert Stewart's brigade to the Nile above Metammeh, had fallen into the hands of the Mahdi, its Egyptian garrison having surrendered, apparently, on Tuesday, Jan. 27; while the fate of General Gordon, being still unknown, was a subject of distressing anxiety. Our own weekly review of the military events of the campaign had been compiled on Wednesday evening, and its opening sentences had expressed satisfaction at the prospect of the immediate "Relief of Khartoum"; but this paragraph was superseded, in the later part of our impression on Thursday, by an acknowledgment of the disastrous news which the War Office had then received.

The report of the fall of Khartoum was first brought to Metammeh by a messenger who went ashore from the island where the steamers stranded, and came by foot to Gubat, the fortified camp of the advanced British force, whence the news of the disaster was at once sent across the Desert to Lord Wolseley. Shortly afterwards, Lieutenant Stuart-Wortley, who had accompanied Sir Charles Wilson in the steamers to Khartoum, arrived at Gubat in a small boat with further details, and a second messenger was promptly dispatched to Korti, the head-quarters of Lord Wolseley. In the meantime, Sir Charles Wilson, having been rescued from his perilous situation on the Nile island by Lord Charles Beresford's steamer, came down to Gubat, and started at once for Korti, where he arrived last Monday evening, and the latest information was then forwarded by telegraph to London.

When Sir Charles Wilson started for Khartoum from Metammeh his expedition was not expected to be dangerous. The report that Omdurman had been captured by the Mahdi rendered it probable that the steamers might have to run the gauntlet of a few shots when they arrived at the junction of the Blue and White Niles; but this was not regarded as a formidable danger. Apparently, however, the river must have fallen since the steamers came down, for one of the vessels is reported to have been wrecked on its way up to Khartoum, probably at the Sixth Cataract, at Shabluka, where the other steamer ran aground on its return. The vessel carrying Sir C. Wilson continued on its way after the loss of its consort until it arrived at Halfiyeh. Here the banks of the river were lined with rebels, who opened fire with four Krupp guns at the steamer. No material damage seems to have been done, owing, no doubt, to the fact that General Gordon had all the steamers protected as far as possible with plates of iron and other means of keeping out missiles. They discovered that the report that Omdurman had fallen into the hands of the enemy was only too true, and from that position also the enemy opened fire. Things began to look worse when the enemy was found to be in possession of the island of Tuti, which lies at the junction of the two Niles, just outside the city of Khartoum. Still pressing on, under a storm of bullets, they came within hail of Khartoum. To their dismay, they found that instead of being welcomed as deliverers, the garrison of the capital took up the fire from which they had been suffering and received them as foes. No flags were flying from the public buildings in the town, which appeared to be in undisputed possession of the enemy. The palace, a well-known building, visible from the river, was to all appearance gutted. Finding it impossible to effect a landing in face of the overwhelming forces of the enemy, they were compelled to retreat out of range, and then endeavour to obtain what information they could by communication with the shore as to the fate which had befallen General Gordon. All reports agreed in asserting that Khartoum was in the hands of the Mahdi, and that the city passed into his possession by treachery. It was stated that Faragh Pasha, being left in charge of the ramparts, on the night of Monday, the 26th, opened the gates and admitted the enemy into the town.

The reports of the fate of General Gordon brought by Lieutenant Stuart-Wortley were conflicting: a messenger from the Mahdi reached Sir C. Wilson when in the steamer on Jan. 29, "telling him that Gordon had adopted the Mahdi's uniform, and calling upon us to surrender; that if we did not become Mohammedans, he would wipe us off the face of the earth." But it was the general opinion that Gordon had been killed, though some said he was shut up in a church at Khartoum, with some Greeks. On Sunday, Feb. 1, Lord Charles Beresford, with the Sofia, one of the steamers left at Gubat, manned by British seamen of the Naval Brigade, started up the river to relieve Sir Charles Wilson and his companions, on the island where they landed when their steamer was wrecked the day before. The steamer moved up slowly against the stream, and was not able to get up there before Tuesday. It was fired at incessantly by the enemy's riflemen, who were estimated to be 4000 strong, and a battery of three Krupp guns, at a point about forty miles above Metammeh. The small steamer was temporarily disabled by a shot passing into her boiler. This mishap compelled Lord Charles to anchor within 500 yards of the native fort; he succeeded, however, in keeping the enemy at bay by means of the Gardners and rifles. The Tuesday afternoon and night were spent in the difficult work of effecting repairs, and the whole party at length got away on the morning of the 4th. The steamer's loss amounted to one seaman killed, seven men wounded, and Lieutenant Van Koughnet, R.N., wounded. Several men were scalded by the outburst of steam. Sir Charles Wilson's loss was two men killed, and twenty wounded—all Egyptians—and four men of the Sussex Regiment slightly injured.

The latest news brought by Sir Charles Wilson was that General Gordon was killed while leaving the Government House on the morning of Jan. 27, the enemy having been admitted into Khartoum during the night.

The British troops in the intrenched camp at Gubat have not been attacked, and have this week been reinforced by the Royal Irish Regiment, which marched on foot across the Desert from Korti, its stores and ammunition being carried by Arabs of the friendly Kabbabish tribe. The Royal Sussex Regiment, the West Kent Regiment, and the Light Camel Corps would follow, so that General Sir Redvers Buller will have a strong force at his disposal to take Metammeh by storm. After capturing Metammeh, he will intrench himself at Gubat, and wait there for General Earle; or else he will march northwards along the Nile bank and meet him at Berber. Of General Earle nothing more need be said at present, except that a day or two ago he was posted at a spot six miles above the village of Berti, on the way up to Abou Hamed.

MAP OF THE EASTERN SOUDAN, SHOWING THE ROUTE FROM SOUAKIM TO BERBER.

In a very short time the interest of the campaign will be diverted to quite a different part of the Soudan—namely, to Souakim. It will be seen from our Map that the Desert between Souakim and Berber measures about two hundred and forty miles across. The garrison at present there is under the command of General Freemantle, who in a recent reconnaissance discovered that Osman Digna was in force in the neighbourhood of Tamai and at the Hasheen Wells, the former about eighteen, the latter about twelve miles from the seaport. The movement of the British troops to Souakim has already begun; two companies of the Mounted Infantry are to start from Egypt immediately, and the other troops which are to be sent from the same country will start in about a week. On the other hand, large forces are now to be sent out from England, and there will be a fresh army collected there in the next five weeks. The Souakim force should be ready to start from its base on or about March 10, and on the first days of April it should be encamped on the Nile at Berber.

The troops which are to be sent out from England are the 1st Battalion of Coldstream Guards, the 2nd Battalion of Grenadier Guards, the 2nd Battalion of Scots Guards, the 20th Hussars, the 5th Royal Irish Lancers, the 3rd Battalion of the Rifle Brigade, the 1st Dorsetshire Regiment, the 10th Company of Royal Engineers, and the Telegraph Company, the 1st Devonshire Regiment, and the 1st Cheshire. These will go to Souakim; the 1st Battalion of Highland Light Infantry, the 2nd Royal Dublin Fusiliers, from Gibraltar, and the 1st Shropshire, from Malta, are also ordered to Egypt; and there will be two or three native infantry battalions and a native cavalry regiment from India. General E. Newdigate, C.B., is mentioned as the probable Commander of the force at Souakim, which will amount to eight thousand men. Lord Wolseley's army in the Soudan, altogether, is between nine and ten thousand already.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, has furnished this week's Number with several interesting Sketches of the march of Sir Herbert Stewart's troops across the Desert from Korti to Metammeh; of the midday halt, with the men of the 1st Life Guards "standing at ease"; the capture of some prisoners near Gakdul; and the water-drawing scenes at Gakdul Wells, the upper and the lower "well," or pool in the rocks, a Sketch of which, by the late Captain Lord St. Vincent, is also engraved for our front page. Lord St. Vincent, in his letter accompanying this Sketch, gives the following description:—"The wells at Gakdul are two; one very large pool, or so-called well, and another small one, which latter is only reached by a circuitous path winding in and out of the rocks from below. They are on the road from Korti to Shendy, nearly midway between these two places, and in a desert almost entirely devoid of other water. For this reason, they are of the greatest importance, in a strategical point of view, to Lord Wolseley's Expedition, as without the possession of them it would be impossible to march a force across nearly two hundred miles of desert; and their occupation by the British troops, on Jan. 2, solved the most difficult problem he had to deal with. I may add that two thousand camels marched in five days two hundred miles, there and back, with a daily allowance of two pints of water per man, to effect the capture of Gakdul Wells."

GENERAL GORDON.

On Wednesday last, six days after the news of the capture or surrender of Khartoum and its occupation by the Mahdi's forces had reached London, the mournful intelligence of General Gordon's death was published, upon the authority of information obtained by Sir Charles Wilson and Lieutenant Stuart Wortley, who arrived on Monday evening at Korti, the head-quarters of Lord Wolseley. It was stated that General Gordon died on the 4th inst., at Khartoum, apparently from a wound inflicted upon him by assassins who stabbed him, on the morning of the 27th ult., as he was coming out of the Government House or Palace, the gates of the city having been opened to the enemy, during the night, by the treacherous officers of the garrison. We fear that the announcement of his death is but too true; it had seemed very possible that he might have been able, with a few personal followers, to escape from the city and to get up the Nile, where he could easily have found a place of safety; and if, on the other hand, he had been taken prisoner by the Mahdi, there is every reason to believe that his life would have been spared, in order that he might be kept for a hostage, or to exact a ransom for his liberation. There does not seem to have been any considerable fighting in Khartoum upon this occasion; and we can only regard the killing of General Gordon as an act of murder, which may have been perpetrated by some of his own revolted native soldiery, or by Musselman fanatics, or perhaps by the perfidious officers and local chiefs who had gone over to the enemy's side.

The character and exploits of this distinguished man, who had just completed the fifty-second year of his age, are well known to his countrymen, and have been described in our Journal upon former occasions. Charles George Gordon, born at Woolwich on Jan. 28, 1833, fourth son of Lieutenant-General H. W. Gordon, R.A., and younger brother of Commissary-General Sir Henry Gordon, K.C.B. (who survives him), entered the Royal Engineers, from Woolwich Academy, in 1852; served in the Crimea, and was employed in the survey of the Russian frontiers in Bessarabia and Armenia; joined the military expedition to China in 1860, and attained the rank of Major. In 1863 he entered the Chinese service, and performed marvellous feats of skilful soldiership, during fifteen months, in subduing the Tai-ping rebels, capturing the cities of Soo-Chow and Nan-King. He was promoted, on quitting the Chinese service, to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, and was made a C.B. When he returned home, in February, 1865, he was appointed Commander of the Royal Engineers at Gravesend, and was employed, during six years, in superintending the construction of forts and batteries on the Thames. In 1871, he was sent to join the International Commission for the improvement of the mouths of the Danube. In 1873, when Sir Samuel Baker retired from the governorship of the Soudan under the late Viceroy of Egypt, Ismail Pasha, Colonel Gordon succeeded him, and laboured zealously to correct the abuses of Egyptian rule in those provinces, and to suppress the slave trade, until July, 1879, when he resigned his office upon the accession of the present Viceroy, Tewfik Pasha. After his return to England, he accepted the post of private secretary to Lord Ripon, who was going out to India as Viceroy; but Gordon resigned this appointment a few days after reaching Bombay. He then went to China for a short visit, and gave the best counsel to the Chinese Government upon the reform of its military administration. In 1881 he held command of the Royal Engineers in the Mauritius; and in 1882 went to the Cape to serve the Colonial Government in command of its local forces in Basutoland; but a disagreement with the Government caused him to resign office in about two months. Major-General Gordon then went to reside in Palestine, devoting himself to studies of Biblical archæology; but in January, last year, he accepted an offer made him by the King of the Belgians, President of the International Association for the settlement of the Congo. He came to London, and went to Brussels for the purpose of arranging the conditions of his intended service on the Congo. KHARTOUM, FROM THE NILE.

had caused much perplexity to our own Government. The Pall Mall Gazette sent an "interviewer" to call upon General Gordon at Southampton, and to elicit his views in favour of the policy of attempting to retain Khartoum and the Eastern Soudan. General Gordon seems to have felt confident of the effect of his personal influence among the native tribes, and of his ability to dissuade them from joining the Mahdi. Although he vehemently protested against the abandonment of the Soudan, the policy which had been announced by the British Government and accepted by the Khedive, it was hastily resolved to send Gordon out upon a special mission, "to report on the military situation there, to provide in the best manner for the safety of the European population of Khartoum, and of the Egyptian garrisons throughout the country, as well as for the evacuation of the Soudan, with the exception of the seaboard." Gordon himself described the mission on which he was going in the following terse phrase:—"I go to cut the dog's tail off. I've got my orders, and I'll do it, coûte que coûte." He distinctly understood that he was not to expect, under any circumstances, the support of a military force; and this he fully acknowledged in his official communications to our Government, before proceeding from Cairo.

It was on Feb. 18 of last year that General Gordon arrived at Khartoum, exactly one month after leaving London. Gordon had made no secret of his confident belief that he would be able to pacify the Soudan by means of his own personal influence, and the effects of administrative and fiscal reforms. This remarkable man always had the courage of his opinions. The very day of his arrival he astonished the Government by telegraphing for Zebehr Pasha's appointment as his assistant, and the next day he liberated the prisoners, burnt the Government records of taxation, and decreed that the practice of holding slaves would not in future be interfered with. This last particular caused considerable excitement in England. Gordon had not been a fortnight in Khartoum before he was able to estimate the real strength of the rebellion, and his proclamation of himself as the Khedive's Governor-General of the Soudan must, to some extent, have produced the contrary effect to that which he intended. The very name of Khedive was an abomination to the powerful Baggara tribes, which had already rallied round the Prophet's standard; to every Arab on the Southern Nile territories, in the Bahr Ghazal, the great country of the slave hunters, and throughout the whole of Kordofan. They could not understand why the English Pasha should assume the title and dignities of Governor-General of the Soudan, if his object was to evacuate the country. In less than a month after Gordon's arrival at Khartoum, the Mahdi and his "Emirs" succeeded in spreading the insurrection throughout most of the Nile districts between Khartoum and Berber. On March 16 one of Gordon's officers was defeated at Halfiyeh, a small town some miles to the north of Khartoum; a few days later, fighting began outside Khartoum, where the Egyptian soldiers, after firing one volley, turned and fled, and were cut down in hundreds by the enemy's cavalry. This defeat, however, was proved to have been due to the treachery of two pashas, who were promptly tried by court-martial and shot. From the day he assumed command, Gordon entertained a very poor opinion of the bulk of the men forming his nominal fighting force. One Arab, he wrote on April 28, was able to put to flight 200 of his wretched Egyptians. Many of the latter he managed to send to Berber, for whose subsequent fall they were in a great measure responsible. By the end of March, the whole country south of Berber was in a state of revolution, and Gordon had almost daily fights with the enemy, but in the latter half of April, his head-quarters at the Khartoum palace were assaulted by the rebels from the opposite shore. By the beginning of May, the Arabs, crossing the Blue Nile, had established themselves at Buri, a mile from the eastern corner of the intrenchments. At this spot, the besiegers suffered terribly from the mines which General Gordon had laid down. As early as the middle of April, Gordon had begun to have recourse to this method of disposing of his assailants. On May 7, nine mines (according to Mr. Power's diary) were exploded during an attack, and one hundred and twenty of the Mahdi's men were blown to pieces. On June 25 General Gordon and his companions had their first news of the fall of Berber, which isolated them still more from the outer world. Nevertheless, they continued the defence with greater vigour than ever. On July 29 Gordon drove the rebels out of Buri, killed numbers of them, captured quantities of rifles and ammunition, and cleared them out of thirteen zerebas or stockades, which they had constructed on the river banks. Mr. Power's diary finishes at the end of July, up to which date General Gordon had lost 700 men. The public feeling in England demanded an expedition for the relief of Gordon. On Aug. 5 the House of Commons passed the vote providing money for preparations to enable the Government to be prepared for contingencies; on the 22nd the Gordon Relief Expedition was finally sanctioned. Early in May, however, orders were sent to Cairo to prepare for the dispatch of the Expedition in October, and 12,000 camels were ordered to be purchased. It was expressly stated, in the instructions of our Government to Lord Wolseley, that the object of the expedition was "to bring away General Gordon and Colonel Stewart from Khartoum; when that object has been secured, no further offensive operations of any kind are to be undertaken." Lord Wolseley was not even to advance so far as Khartoum unless he considered "such a step essential to secure the safe retreat of General Gordon and Colonel Stewart"; but, in that case, he was "not precluded" from doing so. He was to "use his best endeavours to ensure the safe retreat of the Egyptian troops of the Khartoum garrison, and of such of the civil employés of Khartoum, together with their families, as might wish to return to Egypt." With these instructions, there was an emphatic renewal by our Government of their assurance that "Egyptian rule in the Soudan should cease," and that the military operations should be limited to the relief of Gordon personally. Lord Wolseley arrived at Cairo on Sept. 10, and at Wady Halfa on the 4th of the following month; but it was not until Nov. 2 that, with the arrival of the first battalion of the South Staffordshire Regiment at Dongola, the actual advance on Khartoum may be said to have commenced. On Nov. 25 the Guards' Camel Corps arrived at Handuk. Three days later the Naval Brigade, under Lord C. Beresford, was formed. December witnessed the transference of the head-quarters to Ambukol, and thence to Korti; and on the 29th Lord Wolseley determined upon dividing his forces and advancing upon Khartoum by the Desert and by the river. The New Year opened auspiciously with the receipt of a message from Gordon, stating that Khartoum was all right on Dec. 14. On Jan. 2 Sir Herbert Stewart arrived at Gakdul Wells with the first portion of his force. He hurried back to Korti, and had returned to Gakdul with reinforcements by the 12th. On the 14th he advanced from Gakdul Wells to Metammeh. On the 17th the brilliant victory of Abou Klea was won. On the 19th the second battle was fought, and the British troops reached their present advanced position at Gubat, close to Metammeh; in a couple of days more they were met by Gordon's four steamers; and Sir Charles Wilson, who was then in command, received Gordon's laconic message, of date Dec. 29, that "Khartoum was all right," and "could hold out for years." Gordon's four steamers reached Metammeh on the 21st; but not until the 24th did Sir Charles Wilson, with two of the steamers and a detachment of the Sussex Regiment, start on their hundred-miles trip to Khartoum. The beleaguered city fell into the hands of the Mahdi on the very day before Sir Charles Wilson's arrival.

This is a sad and tragical story; and we wish it could be shown that adequate measures had been taken to communicate to the Mahdi, and to the insurgent tribes of the Soudan, while Khartoum was yet safe, the conciliatory intentions of our Government. Her Majesty's Ministers were of opinion, as they always said, "that the extension of Egyptian rule over these distant countries has been injurious to the interests of the people of Egypt." It was obvious, indeed, "that Egypt has not, and cannot be expected to have, either pecuniary resources or military strength sufficient to justify the extension of her territory beyond the natural boundary of the great Desert to the south." These grounds justified their conviction that the advice it was their duty to give the Khedive to retire from the Soudan was wise and necessary, and they gave instructions accordingly both to General Gordon and to Lord Wolseley. It was stated that the Egyptian Government would be prepared to pay a reasonable subsidy to any chief, or number of chiefs, who would be sufficiently powerful to maintain order along the valley of the Nile from Wady Halfa to Khartoum, and who would agree to the following conditions:—1. To remain at peace with Egypt, and to repress any raids on Egyptian territory. 2. To encourage trade with Egypt. 3. To prevent and discourage by all possible means any expeditions for the sale and capture of slaves. Either General Gordon or Lord Wolseley was authorised to conclude any arrangements which fulfil these general conditions, but we are not aware that such efforts have been made; and the forcible repression of the Soudan revolt has been pursued with results hitherto unavailing, at an enormous sacrifice of life, accompanied by the fall of Khartoum and the death of General Gordon.

The Portrait of General Gordon presented for our Extra Supplement this week is from a photograph by Messrs. Adams and Scanlan, of Southampton.

KHARTOUM AND ITS NEIGHBOURHOOD.

Khartoum, situated at the junction of the White Nile, the river of the Equatorial Lakes, with the Blue Nile, which flows from the mountains of western Abyssinia through the plains of Sennaar, is 1500 miles from Cairo, but has been, during sixty years past, the capital of the Egyptian dominions in the Soudan. When the founder of the present reigning family in Egypt, the famous Pasha Mohamed Ali, sent his sons, Ismail and Ibrahim, in 1819, to extend his authority up the Nile and to conquer the Soudan, Khartoum at once became the natural base of their operations and the future capital of their conquests. Before that period, the principal town in this region had been Shendy, for it was there that the merchants of the Arabian coast and the African interior exchanged their commodities. The town of Khartoum is therefore closely associated with the rule of the Pashas and Khedives of Egypt. Khartoum lies on the left bank of the Blue Nile or Bahr-el-Azrak, and rather more than three miles south of its confluence with the White Nile or Bahr-el-Abiad, at the northern point of the Isle of Tuti. The channel south of that island affords a slightly nearer approach to the White Nile, coming out immediately opposite the new and fortified camp of Omdurman, whence Colonel Hicks set out on his unfortunate expedition last year. Travellers have described its appearance as they have approached it by the river as "a long mud wall," with a few buildings of greater size than architectural pretensions peeping over it; but they all agree, from Mr. George Melly, who visited it thirty-five years ago, to Sir Samuel Baker and General Gordon, in saying that its external aspect is much to be preferred to the reality found inside its walls. This feature it shares with almost every Oriental town that could be named. There must, however, have been something exceptionally disagreeable in the smells of Khartoum to have raised such unpleasant memories and so strong a feeling of disgust in the minds of so many experienced travellers. General Gordon has explained the reason why the stench can be tolerated, and how it has not produced the mortality that one would have expected. The atmosphere, except during the rainy season, which is now close at hand, is so dry that everything "is dried up hard in an incredibly short space of time." The population of the town has fluctuated very much, principally in accordance with the character of the Governor for the time being. If he has not exceeded the limits of human endurance, Khartoum has contained as many as 30,000 people; but sometimes official exactions have been too cruel, and the population has fallen to half that number. Authorities agree, however, that, while the proportion of inmates fluctuates, there are 3000 houses in Khartoum. These are of uniform character and appearance, being all constructed of mud and having flat roofs. Mr. Melly, already mentioned, has given the following description of the inside of Khartoum:—"The town consists of about 3000 houses, resembling those already described. Architecture in these regions being in an extremely primitive condition, the arrangement of the streets is just what might be expected from the aspect of the houses. There are no spacious thoroughfares; here and there appears something like a square or space, but the perspective generally is by no means such as would satisfy the humble European judgment in the art of building. The better class of houses are possessed either by the Government officials or by the European residents. In some there are approaches to luxury, in others to comfort; indeed, it is but fair to acknowledge that, with the addition of delightful gardens and a pleasant climate, it is not difficult to reconcile oneself to a residence within mud walls." The only building with any pretensions to importance is the Hukumdarieh, or residence of the Governor of Hukumdar, in which General Gordon concentrated the scanty force of which he could alone dispose. This building, which General Gordon during his former rule there called "as large as Marlborough House," is situated close to the river; and the steamers which form the Nile flotilla, and which originally numbered fifteen, are beached during the shallow period of the river under the protection of the palace guns. The town of Khartoum itself is surrounded by a wall and a ditch, except where it is protected by the Blue Nile; but a large garrison would be required to guard it in its full extent against a numerous enemy. On the western side the wall approaches to within half a mile of the White Nile, so that Khartoum, from its admirable position in the fork of the rivers, effectually commands both channels. Khartoum is the centre of the ship or boat building trade on the Upper Nile, and several of the neighbouring villages on the river are inhabited exclusively by the people employed in these works.

The London Stereoscopic Company has supplied us with four photographs of Khartoum, the originals of which, as we understand, were sent home by General Gordon to his family in England during the period of his former Governorship of the Soudan, which terminated in July, 1879. They represent the Fort, or Barracks, the Governor's Palace, and two Views on the banks of the Blue Nile, one looking up that river, and the other looking down, opposite to Tuti Island. The Palace is the house where General Gordon is said to have been stabbed, on the 27th ult., as he was coming out of the door; and if he died of his wound, according to some accounts, on the 4th inst., he may have expired in one of the rooms of the Palace.

We are indebted to Colonel J. A. Grant, C.B., F.R.S., the well-known African traveller and explorer who accompanied Captain Speke in his journey to discover the source of the Nile, when they were the first to visit the shores of Lake Victoria Nyanza, for some interesting Views of the junction of the Blue and the White Nile at Omdurman and in the neighbourhood of Khartoum; also of the river about sixty miles below Khartoum, near "Mount Rooeeyan," above the Sixth Cataract; and of the Fort of Abou Hamed (or Abou Ahmed), which is distant, we suppose, nearly three hundred miles from Khartoum, being situated at the northern extremity of the great bend of the Nile, where the Desert route from Korosko terminates on the right bank of the river. This view of Abou Hamed will nevertheless be interesting at the present crisis, because General Earle's movement up the river from Korti is directed immediately to that point, from which he was expected to turn southward, ascending the river to Berber; and it is not unlikely that the operations which must now be undertaken to concentrate Lord Wolseley's forces at Berber may render that part of the Nile, from Berber to Abou Hamed, of much greater military importance. For the moment, however, our attention is turned rather to the neighbourhood of Khartoum, and to the portion of the Nile below Khartoum as far as Metammeh, near Shendy, and to the position of the advanced British force at Gubat. Colonel Grant's sketches were made in April, 1863, but the natural features of the localities he has delineated cannot have undergone much alteration. There are probably some buildings of more recent construction at Khartoum; and the fortifications at Omdurman, being part of the new works, do not appear in the Views drawn by Colonel Grant. It may be remembered that a twelvemonth ago, on Feb. 10 last year, he wrote to the Times upon this subject, with reference to General Gordon's journey to Khartoum, and then made public some extracts from his journal of 1863, describing the condition of the river all the way from Khartoum to Berber, speaking particularly of the islands, the shoals and sunken rocks, the Gherri Pass, the rapids of Gibloga, the so-called Sixth Cataract, and other difficult parts of the voyage midway between Khartoum and Metammeh, which were probably found to be the worst obstacles to Sir Charles Wilson's recent passage with his steamers. We shall now give Colonel Grant's notes accompanying the Sketches furnished by him, without further comment:—

"The sketches of Omdurman and Khartoum are taken from the same spot; one looks down and the other up the Blue Nile. The junction of the White and Blue Niles is seen in the Omdurman sketch. The former river passes some rocks here, and is turbulent, with a strong current; whereas the Blue Nile, at the same low season, is quite placid and easily forded; boats are generally poled up it. The hills are seven miles from the river. It may be seen from the sketch of Khartoum that the clay bank of the Blue Nile, on which the town stands, is liable to slip at every inundation, the river rising twenty feet higher than is seen in the sketch, and coming into portions of the town during flood-time each September and October. It is merely a matter of time for Khartoum to disappear entirely, and for its materials to be carried down to the Delta of the Nile, as it goes foot by foot every year; but the town might be rebuilt on new ground.

"Mount Rooeeyan is near that part on the river where boats rest for the night previous to descending through the shoals of rocks from here to the Sixth Cataract. The process of navigation through the rocks requires a pilot and steersman of skill, and it takes at least four hours during the months of low Nile and one hour during high Nile to make the descent, as the rounded river rocks are below water, and the sluices are full."

With reference to his sketch of the Nile at Abou Hamed, Colonel Grant supplies the following note:—"The mud fort of Abou Hamed is nearly buried in sand on its north side; indeed, the wall here is bridged over with sand blown from the Korosko Desert behind it. The whole of the Nile is not seen in this sketch. The right branch is represented, and the Island of Mograt, from which the natives of Abou Hamed obtain supplies. The road in the foreground goes between Abou Hamed and Berber."

SIR CHARLES WILSON, C.B., K.C.M.G.

This distinguished Colonel of the Royal Engineers, who took the command as senior officer of the advanced force of the Khartoum Expedition when General Sir Herbert Stewart was wounded on the 19th inst., and who afterwards went up in a steam-boat to Khartoum, has seen much Staff service, and his previous experience had specially qualified him for the duty in which he has just been engaged. As a subaltern, he acted as secretary to Sir J. Hawkins in the delimitation of the boundary between our possessions in British North America and United States territory, and served for several years on the Ordnance Survey in Ireland and Scotland. From 1869 to 1876 he acted as Assistant Quartermaster-General on the Intelligence Branch of the Head-quarters' Staff. In 1879 he was employed under the Foreign Office in Turkey and Asia Minor, and later on, while officiating as Consul-General of Anatolia, was ordered to Egypt for special duty, gaining the medal, with clasp and bronze star, for his services in the Egyptian campaign of 1882. During the present campaign, he has acted as head of the Intelligence Department with the expeditionary force, and was acting in this capacity with the Staff of Brigadier-General Sir Herbert Stewart in the advance from Korti to Metammeh. He was in temporary command of the troops at Gubat, until the arrival of Major-General Sir Redvers Buller. He went up to Khartoum with two steam-boats on the 24th ult., but, on approaching that town on the 28th, found it in the possession of the enemy, and returned with the utmost difficulty, his vessel being exposed to a continual fire of musketry from the river banks. Both the steamers were wrecked, and Sir Charles Wilson, with the party who accompanied him, passed several days on an island near the Sixth Cataract, at Shabluka, till they were relieved by the other steamers from Gubat. He has, since then, quitted the camp of the advanced force at Gubat, and arrived last Monday at Korti, Lord Wolseley's head-quarters, to report the details of his information concerning the actual state of affairs at Khartoum. Sir Charles William Wilson was born in 1836, being a son of the late Mr. Edward Wilson; he was educated at Cheltenham, and entered the Royal Engineers, in which he became Lieutenant in 1855, Captain in 1864, Major in 1873, and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel in 1879. He was created a Knight of the Order of St. Michael and St. George in 1881, having been made a Companion of the Bath in 1877 for civil services. He rendered valuable services to the Palestine Exploration Committee, from 1864 to 1868, in the earlier topographical surveys of the Holy Land and adjacent countries, and in editing their reports for publication.

OFFICERS KILLED IN THE SOUDAN.

Our Obituary last week contained a memoir of the late Lord St. Vincent, a Captain in the 16th Lancers, who died of the wounds received in the battle of Abou Klea, on the 17th ult. This nobleman, the fourth Viscount St. Vincent, John Edward Leveson Jervis, was in the thirty-fifth year of his age. He was educated at Harrow, and it is the intention of the masters and boys of that school to place in the chapel a commemorative tablet bearing record of the late Lord St. Vincent and of the late Colonel Burnaby, likewise an old Harrovian, who fell in the same day's fighting. Lord St. Vincent had served with credit in the Zulu, Afghan, Transvaal, and Egyptian campaigns. As orderly officer to Major-General Marshall, during the Zulu war, he was present with the 17th Lancers in the engagements at Zunguin Mountain and Ulundi. For his services in those actions he obtained a medal and clasp. In the expedition against the Marrees, in Southern Afghanistan, in 1880, he also served as orderly officer to Brigadier-General Macgregor, and was mentioned in the despatches, besides receiving a medal. In the Transvaal war of 1881, he acted as Adjutant of Barrow's Mounted Infantry. His service as Aide-de-camp to Major-General Drury-Lowe, in the Egyptian war of 1882, and his part in the memorable cavalry ride and capture of Cairo, will also be remembered. For these services he received a medal with clasp, the decoration of the Fourth Class of the Medjidieh, and the Khedive star. In Lord St. Vincent the English Army has lost a brave and promising officer, whose devotion to the duties of his chosen profession of arms was proved in a succession of arduous campaigns. Our Portrait of this nobleman is from a photograph by Mr. Samuel A. Walker, of 230, Regent-street.

The Illustrated London News, not many days ago, received from his Lordship, when he had accompanied the first reconnaissance of the intended route of Sir Herbert Stewart's advanced force, in its march across the Desert from Korti to Metammeh, as far as Gakdul Wells, reaching that place on Jan. 2, the Sketch of the rocky ravine and secluded wells at that place, which is reproduced in our front page Engraving. Lord St. Vincent, who acted as Captain and Adjutant of the Heavy Camel Corps, which was composed partly of soldiers and officers from different cavalry regiments of our Army, sent us this Sketch, with a letter, from Korti, the head-quarters of the Expedition, on the 6th, when the first reconnoitring party had returned from Gakdul, and when preparations were being made for the definite movement of Sir Herbert Stewart's column forward to Metammeh. An extract from his letter, describing the wells, is given in another article, with some remarks upon our different Illustrations of Gakdul.

Captain Joseph Watkins Williams Darley, 4th (Royal Irish) Dragoon Guards, was born at Dublin, on Aug. 29, 1853, and entered that regiment as a Sub-Lieutenant in November, 1873; he obtained a Lieutenant's commission in November, 1874, and that of Captain on Oct. 29, 1881. He served with his regiment in the Egyptian war of 1882, and was present at the two actions at Kassassin, the battle of Tel-el-Kebir, and the march to Cairo and capture of that city. He received the Egyptian medal with clasp and the Khedive's star. The Portrait of Captain Darley is from a photograph by Messrs. W. and A. H. Fry, of Brighton.

Conductor of Supplies A. C. Jewell, who was killed near Metammeh on the 19th ult., although a gentleman by birth, at the age of twenty, in June, 1871, enlisted as a trooper in the 20th Hussars, and rose after four years' service to the position of Quartermaster-Sergeant in that regiment. In February, 1879, he was made Conductor of Supplies; and in the same year served with distinction in South Africa, obtaining a medal. His portrait was taken when serving in the Hussars, by Messrs. Hennah and Kent, of Brighton.

THE LATE MR. ST. LEGER HERBERT, C.M.G.

The Special Correspondent of the Morning Post, Mr. St. Leger Algernon Herbert, who was killed, as well as Mr. Cameron, of the Standard, in the fighting on the 19th ult., belonged to that branch of the Herbert family of which the Earl of Carnarvon is the head. His grandfather, the Very Rev. William Herbert, Dean of Manchester, was third son of the first Earl of Carnarvon; and the Dean's second son, Captain Frederick Herbert, R.N., was the father of St. Leger Algernon Herbert, by his marriage with the daughter of the late Captain Henry Stuart, of the 39th Regiment. Mr. St. Leger Herbert was in his thirty-fifth year, and had seen varied service. His University career was brilliant. He was a scholar of Wadham College, and obtained a first class at the Oxford Moderations. His first public appointment was with Lord Dufferin, when that nobleman was Governor-General of Canada. He acted as private secretary to Lord Wolseley (then Sir Garnet) at the annexation of Cyprus, and was civil secretary to Sir Garnet Wolseley again when he proceeded to South Africa as High Commissioner. For his services on these occasions Mr. Herbert was made a Commander of St. Michael and St. George. He was present at the taking of Sekukuni's mountain, for which he obtained the South African medal. Mr. Herbert was also civil secretary to Sir Frederick Roberts in South Africa, and when that General returned to England he was made secretary to the Transvaal Commission. Mr. Herbert served with the Mounted Infantry at Tel-el-Kebir as a volunteer, for which he obtained the Egyptian medal. He was present two years later at the engagements of El Teb and Tamasi, where he acted as galloper to Sir H. Stewart, and obtained the clasp. At Tamasi Mr. Herbert received a severe wound, but his youth and good constitution enabled him quickly to recover from it. The Morning Post had the advantage of his services as correspondent during a portion of the Souakim expedition, and in the present campaign up the Nile.

The Portrait of this gentleman is from a photograph by Messrs. Boning and Small, of Baker-street.

Our Portrait of the late Right Hon. Sir Robert Phillimore, Bart., D.C.L., is from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company. That of Police-Constable William Cole, engraved last week, was by Messrs. A. and G. Taylor, photographers, of Queen Victoria-street.

The officers of the Fishmongers' Company last month seized at Billingsgate Market thirteen tons and a half of fish as unfit for human food. In the same period, the total delivery of fish at Billingsgate was, by land, 9440 tons, and by water 3896 tons, or 13,336 tons in all. Five cwt. of fish were seized at Farringdon Market during the month.

James Gilbert Cunninghame and Harry Burton were again charged at Bow-street Police Court on Monday with being concerned in the dynamite outrage at the Tower. Mr. Poland, who prosecuted, stated that the case was but yet in its infancy. He gave a narrative of the movements of the two prisoners, showing that, during the past year, although but working men—the one a dock labourer and the other a carpenter—they had twice crossed the Atlantic, and were in London at the time of the explosions at Scotland-yard and the Carlton Club. They had been seen together by a detective set to watch Burton. After some additional evidence had been given, the accused were again remanded.

NEWS FROM NICE.—With the exception of a very few wet and cold days, the weather is again splendid. Not a flake of snow has fallen. The sun shines almost perpetually, and the influence of its warm rays makes life enjoyable to all, and more especially to those who have by impaired health sought its influence.
There are no epidemics, and the average mortality of the city in 1884 was less per mille than London and many fashionable towns in England.
The streets, roads, and sewers are constantly cleansed and disinfected, and watered from the mountain stream of the Vesubie. There are three English doctors and physicians in practice here—viz., Messrs. West, Wakefield, and Sturge, and they will be happy to communicate with any intending visitors as to the healthfulness of the town.
The effects of the recent storm (the like of which has been unknown for thirty-five years) were comparatively trifling, and repaired in twenty-four hours. In some few low-lying rooms and cellars, near the Fish Market, the wash from the open waves had entered, but this was soon pumped out by the firemen and military.
Visitors are hastening in increasing numbers, as is their wont at this season, and the approach of Carnival, which report says will be the best on record. The Municipal Theatre will open immediately, and the Théâtre Français, of which Mr. Cortelazzo continues the able Director, has several Star Artists for the Opera Comique, and an excellent Troupe de Comédie.
The Carnival and Regatta will be fully announced with other fêtes.

THE CHURCH.

It is stated that Canon Liddon will be the new Bishop of Salisbury.

The Archbishop of York reopens Acaster Malbis parish church, after restoration, to-day (Saturday).

In the absence of the Bishop of Rochester, who is indisposed, the Bishop of St. David's yesterday week consecrated St. Luke's Church, Grange-road, Bermondsey.

The Blakeney Memorial Committee, of which the Archbishop of York is the chairman, have decided that the memorial shall take the form of a scholarship, and also a tablet to be erected in Bridlington Priory Church.

An organ recital was given on Tuesday afternoon in the Temple Church by Dr. E. J. Hopkins, the organist, on the occasion of the 700th anniversary of the consecration of the church by Heraclius, Patriarch of Jerusalem, 1185.

Dr. Temple, the Bishop designate of London, on Saturday last, and the Archbishop of Canterbury on Sunday, in Westminster Abbey, directed the opening services in connection with the Mission which is being conducted this week in north and west London.

The Rev. Brooke Lambert, Vicar of Greenwich, preached in Westbourne Park Baptist Chapel on Sunday night, at the invitation of the Rev. Dr. Clifford, the pastor, and the offerings collected were devoted to the London Mission now being carried on from Church centres.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have given a site whereon a new Norwich Diocesan Training College for Schoolmistresses is to be built. The college is to be erected in compliance with the requirements of the Education Department, the existing one having been condemned.

An offering of £1000 has been sent to the Vicar of Teddington, by a donor who does not wish his name made public. It is to be used in aid of the new church buildings. This is the second offering of £1000 made to the church since the Vicar's arrival in Teddington. Another anonymous donor has sent £200 for the purpose of improving and decorating the chancel of the parish church.

Both Houses of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury reassembled on Tuesday. In the Upper House resolutions expressing regret at the loss the House and the Church have sustained by the death of the late Bishop of London and the resignation of the Bishop of Lincoln were passed. The Lower House was mainly occupied with a discussion on the report of a committee on fallen women.

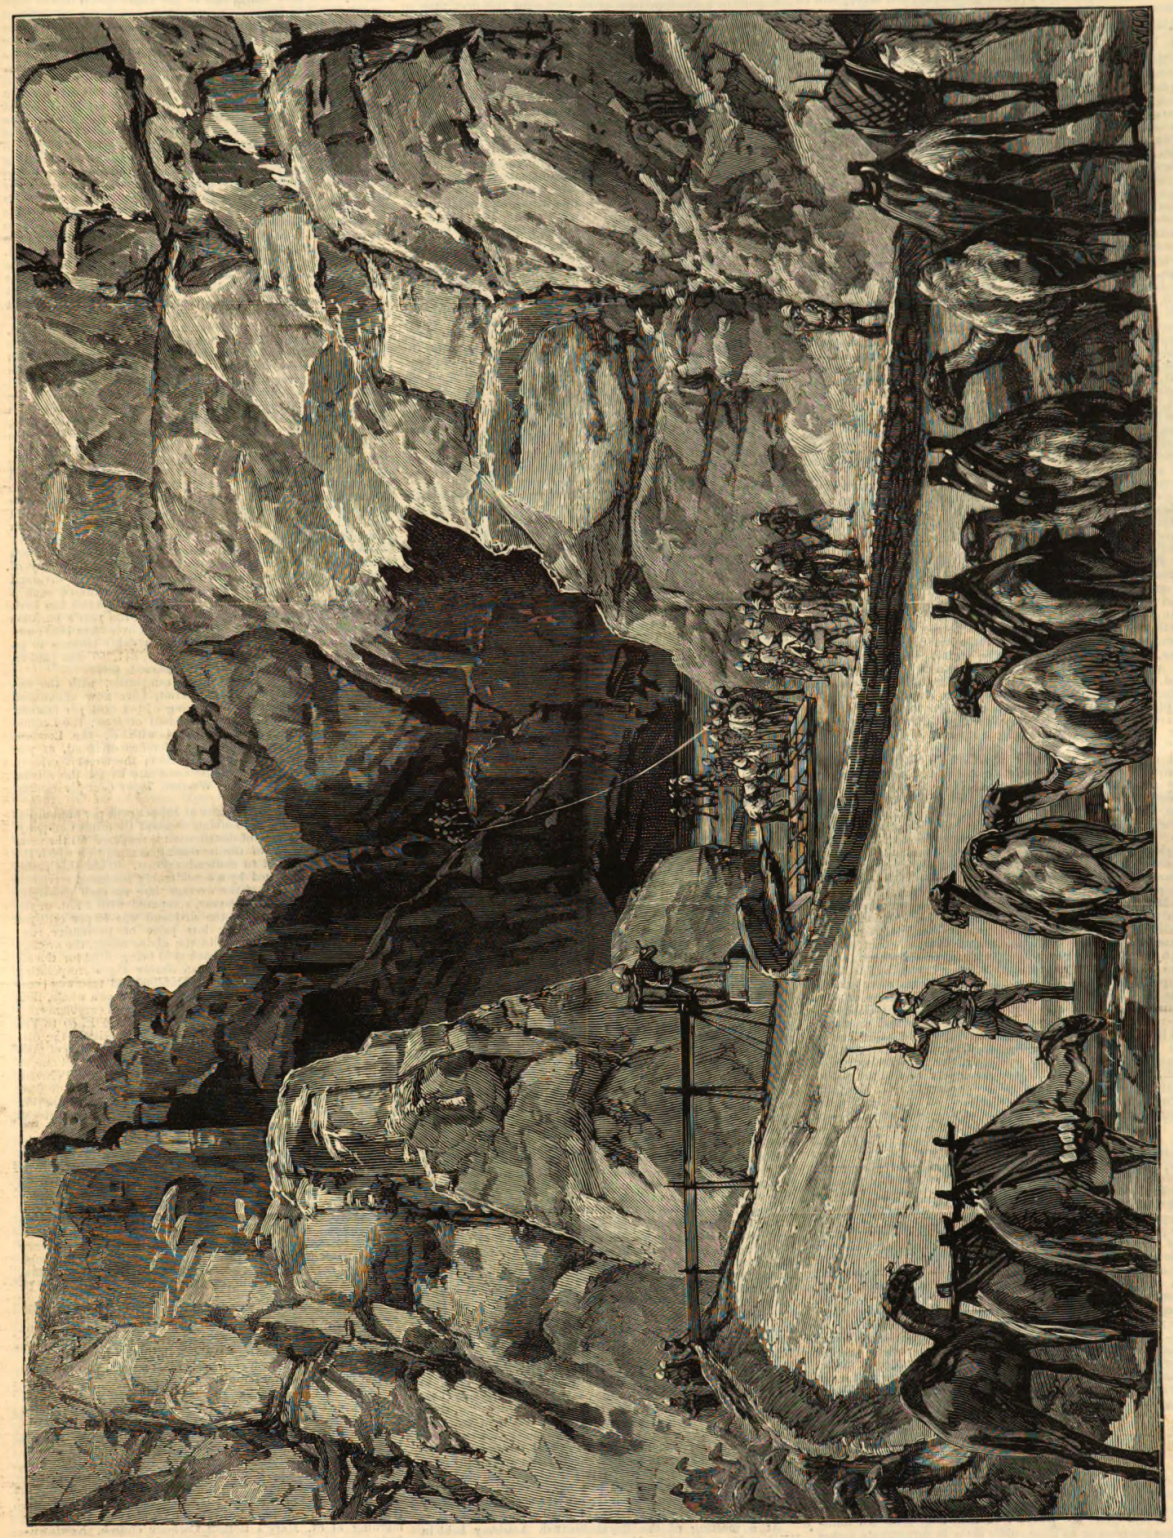
The Bishop of Ely, the Bishop of Durham, and Mr. Beresford-Hope, M.P., were present on the 3rd inst. at the dedication of the last portion of St. Luke's Church, Chesterton, Cambridge, and spoke at the luncheon. The Bishop of Durham referred to the difficulty in the diocese in keeping pace with the ever-increasing demand for church accommodation. He wished he had a Cambridge University, with its many voluntary workers, in proximity to some of the towns in his diocese.

On Tuesday the Bishop of Chester consecrated a new church at Warburton, Cheshire. The church has been erected at a cost of £7000. The picturesque old Church of St. Mereburgh, which will now cease to be the parish church, bears the site date of 1645. The Rector is the Rev. Geoffrey Egerton; who was nominated to the living by Mr. Rowland Egerton Warburton, of Arley Hall, Cheshire, at whose expense the new church has been erected.

Attention is called to an advertisement in another column, from which it will be seen how inadequate has been the response to what has proved to have been the last public appeal put forward by the late Bishop of London for Rescue work in the London Mission. Money is especially needed for that most trying and difficult work—the rescue of the fallen. Many devoted ladies are ready to help, but the providing of homes, both temporary and permanent, is costly. Will any of our readers send donations to the treasurer, the Rev. A. J. Ingram, 20, Finsbury-square, E.C.?

M. Waddington, the French Ambassador, presided last Saturday night at the annual dinner in aid of the French Hospital and Dispensary, Leicester-place. Subscriptions amounting to £1200 were announced.

The silver medal awarded by the jurors of the International Health Exhibition to the Society for Improving the Condition of the Labouring Classes was on Tuesday presented to the Earl of Shaftesbury, as its president for over forty years, by Mr. Alfred Alewood, secretary, in accordance with a resolution passed at the last committee meeting of that society, proposed by Rev. Canon Nisbet, and carried unanimously.



The number of live stock and the quantity of fresh meat shipped weekly to this country from the United States and Canada continues on a very large scale. The arrivals at Liverpool during the past week from the above-named countries were in excess of any preceding week since the beginning of the year. The total imports amounted to 2069 cattle, 12,805 quarters of sheep, 2184 carcases of mutton, and 100 hogs.

In London last week 2806 births and 1592 deaths were registered. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 101 and the deaths 473 below the average numbers in the corresponding weeks of the last ten years. There were 41 deaths from smallpox, 16 from measles, 18 from scarlet fever, 19 from diphtheria, and 41 from whooping-cough. The 41 fatal cases of smallpox did not include 19 deaths of London residents from this disease recorded in the Metropolitan Asylums Hospitals.

We learn that an error occurred last week in our account of the parentage of the gallant General Sir Herbert Stewart. His father, the Rev. Edward Stewart, of Sparsholt Rectory, Hampshire, was there described as an Irish clergyman, whereas, in fact, he was very much Scotch, being grandson of the seventh Earl of Galloway; he was son of the Hon. Edward Richard Stewart, who was brother to George, eighth Earl of Galloway, and also to Lieutenant-General the Hon. Sir William Stewart, K.C.B., who commanded a division throughout the Peninsular War, and who raised the Rifle Brigade; whilst the mother of the Rev. Edward Stewart was the Lady Katherine Charteris, sister of the seventh Earl of Wemyss. The mother of Sir Herbert Stewart was an Irish lady, Louisa Anne, daughter of C. J. Herbert, Esq., of Muckross Abbey, Killarney.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

There are two plays, at any rate, that are never played to empty benches. When all else fails, the experienced manager cannot go far wrong when he puts up "Hamlet" or "The School for Scandal." Sheridan's immortal comedy has once more been selected for a run of popularity, and it may now be seen to considerable advantage at the Prince's Theatre, thanks to the enterprise and good taste of Mrs. Langtry. It is a matter of history that one of the most brilliant revivals of this play occurred at the Prince of Wales's Theatre during the management of the Bancrofts, and it is equally well known that it had an extraordinary run of good luck at the Vaudeville some years ago, soon after Mr. Thorne assumed the managerial seat. We remember the first chiefly on account of its luxury of appointment; the last, by reason of the excellence of the cast. Here, at the Prince's, we have a judicious mixture of the two celebrated revivals. Mr. Charles Coghlan comes to play Charles Surface, with his own charm of style and admirable comedy spirit, bringing with him, from the pretty little band-box theatre in the Tottenham-court-road, recollections of the minuets, the assemblies, the fashions, the customs, and the minute detail of society life in the last century. Whilst, on the other hand, we have artists like William Farren, with his father's traditions at his fingers' ends for Sir Peter, a rich, spirited, and most admirable performance; Mrs. Arthur Stirling for Mrs. Candour, Mr. A. Wood for Crabtree, and Mr. F. Everill a capital Sir Oliver Surface. It will thus be seen that Mrs. Langtry is anxious to associate herself with the best art that can be obtained in these days, when comedy is for the most part presented in a haphazard fashion. Much has been said recently of the doubtful advantage of first-night criticism, and we have had endless discussions as to how far art is injured by the inevitable hurry of publicity. But, whether new plays or revivals are criticised on the first night or not, the experienced eye and the trained judgment can easily see how far the little difficulties of a first production are temporary, and how far they will permanently disfigure the work under discussion. There were no doubt grave misfortunes connected with the first performance of the "School for Scandal." The play began late, and was started at a snail's pace. The waits were interminably long. The scenes were curiously divided. The audience was puzzled by the continual dropping of those abominable things known as tableaux curtains; the minor characters were, as a rule, indifferently played; and we certainly missed that finish, punctuality, order, and style that are associated with our first comedy theatres.

But, for all that, it was easy to see that the defects were merely temporary. It is as unjust to ridicule such a revival as contemptible because of the accidental slips of a disorganised first night, as it is to go harping on the fact that Mrs. Langtry is handsomely dressed, and thereby implying that the audiences of the future are asked to see costumes and not comedy. Such comments as these are utterly misleading. The waits, the hitches, the disorder, and the dullness of a first representation like this can be easily remedied; and, when they are, is it not at least charitable on the part of those who understand what acting is, to recommend a visit to a playhouse that can show a Sir Peter like Mr. William Farren, a Charles Surface like Mr. Coghlan, a Sir Oliver like Mr. Everill, all of whom give tone and health to the best scenes in the play, and who cannot fail by their example to put a little life and heart into their frightened or listless companions? And as to the dresses worn by Mrs. Langtry, about which so much fuss is made. If she is well dressed, and in accordance with the fashion of the period, so is everyone else. She does not stand out alone, the centre of a shabby crew. It is not her fault that she has distinction and style. No; the old play is quite as well dressed and mounted as it ought to be; the rout, with its crowds of dancers and loungers, is amply sufficient for the purpose, and the supper scene of Charles is thoroughly in accordance with the temper of the play, and of the age in which it was written.

Mrs. Langtry's Lady Teazle is to me a very interesting study. She avoids, for the most part, old business and tradition when she cannot feel the importance of them. Her comedy scenes are full of life and nature. Her coaxing with Sir Peter is never loud, vulgar, or hoydenish. She dances a minuet as to the manner born; and whether supposed to have been brought up in the country or not, the new Lady Teazle has evidently soon acquired a taste of town manners. It is just the sort of woman, in fact, socially considered, who would have attracted a precise and particular old bachelor like Sir Peter. He could never have tolerated for one instant a wearisome fidget. His wife must before all things be a lady, and this is clearly Mrs. Langtry's view. I wish, on the other hand, she could appear to feel the pathos of the screen scene more than she appears to do. Her tones were not sufficiently sincere, either in her humiliation before Sir Peter or her disgust at the conduct of Joseph the hypocrite. A Lady Teazle, to succeed here, must be lost in her abandonment to the situation. She must feel the position, or she will never be able to make it effective. Anyhow, Mrs. Langtry has already shown us good work far in advance of anything she has given before, and her industry will in the end be rewarded with inevitable success. I confess that I do not understand Mr. Beerbohm Tree's reading of Joseph Surface. The man was no vulgar hypocrite, it is true; he did not wear his deceit on his sleeve; there was something extremely subtle in his humbug. He was what modern ladies call "very deep"; but I, for one, never conceived him to be a fantastic, somewhat indolent creature, who could scarcely take the trouble to carry on an intrigue, or had not the method of expressing passion. Lady Teazle is, at any rate, fascinated by him, or there is no meaning in the play; but there is little in the new Joseph to suggest the subtle lady-killer. For, of course, Joseph Surface has his one chance of showing his real nature. He may deceive society and Sir Peter, but when he is left alone with Lady Teazle in her library, then the real man comes out. If the serpent is not shown here, fangs and all, the difficulty in which Lady Teazle is placed is not apparent. A good acting scene goes for nothing. But, after all, it is the one difficult character in the whole range of comedy. Mr. John Clayton got nearest to it, years ago, at the Vaudeville; but never in our time has it been quite satisfactorily played. All the opening scenes of the play were ruined and made ineffective by the "under-acting" that is now so much in fashion. If managers only knew the folly of the policy of intrusting good dialogue to those who cannot understand it to begin with, and have no method of delivering it afterwards, they would spare the patience of their audience. An uninteresting actress or an inarticulate actor in subordinate scenes does more damage than can be easily remedied. And when a play begins with yawns it requires a genius to pick it up again. The modern school of acting has its merits, but the young actor or actress of the period is, as a rule, totally at sea in old comedy. They dawdle, they do not act; they mumble, they do not speak. Success is obtained by an electric communication between artist and audience. The audience is ever on the alert, but the artist is too often stupid or sulky—or both.

MUSIC.

Mr. Walter Bache's annual grand orchestral concert at St. James's Hall, on Thursday week, was a specialty occurring too late for more than brief mention until now. Mr. Bache has, for some years, been a strong and practical advocate for the claims of Liszt to rank as a great composer. Many of his important works have been given—some for the first time in this country—at Mr. Bache's concerts, thus affording opportunities for judgment thereon that should be welcomed by all, whether admirers or not of the remarkable compositions of one of the most remarkable men of recent times. Last week's concert included a fine performance of one of Liszt's most elaborate works, his symphony in illustration of Dante's "Divina Commedia." This had before been given at one of Mr. W. Ganz's orchestral concerts, and was noticed at the time. The music of the first part, "Inferno," contains much that is wild and eccentric even beyond the limits that might be conceded for such a subject; in the next divisions, "Purgatorio" and "Paradiso," there are some pleasing passages, especially those suggestive of the loves of Paolo and Francesca da Rimini; and the close—with female choir singing the Magnificat to a Gregorian chant, and ending with "Hosanna, Hallelujah"—is impressive. The symphony altogether, however, is lengthened to a degree not justified by its musical interest. Mr. Bache played Liszt's first Pianoforte Concerto (in E flat) with much success; and the same composer's "Scène Dramatique," "Jeanne d'Arc au bucher" (well sung by Mdlle. Alice Barbi); an "Angelus" for stringed instruments; the march, "Die heiligen drei Könige," from "Christus"; and the orchestral arrangement of the popular "Rakóczy" march (with which the concert began), made up a representative selection from the works of Franz Liszt. With the exception of the concerto (directed by Mr. Dannreuther), the performances were conducted by Mr. Bache. The band and choir were on an extensive and efficient scale.

At last week's concert of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society—the seventh performance of the fourteenth season—Mr. Mackenzie's oratorio, "The Rose of Sharon," was given for the first time in that locality. The work, it will be remembered, was commissioned for the Norwich Festival of October last, when it was produced with great success, having been soon afterwards performed at St. James's Hall, the Crystal Palace, and elsewhere, with a similar result. In last week's performance, Miss Griswold (the American soprano) sang the music of the Sulamite with much refinement, that of the Beloved having been rendered with earnest feeling by Mr. B. McGuckin. As on a former occasion elsewhere, Miss Hilda Wilson sang the contralto music with fine effect—Mr. W. Mills having displayed progress in the important passages for Solomon. The choral and orchestral performances were worthy of the society. Mr. Barnby conducted, and Dr. Stainer presided at the organ.

The Monday Popular Concert of this week included the last appearance here this season of Madame Norman-Néruda. At the afternoon performance of to-day (Saturday) Herr Joachim is to appear for the first time this season.

Mr. John Boosey's attractive "London Ballad Concerts" are approaching the close of their nineteenth season, nine performances of the series having now been given. This week's concert included the last appearance here of Madame Trebelli, whose fine singing has been a special feature on previous occasions.

Mr. Anton Hartvigson—a pianist of exceptional skill—gave a recital at Prince's Hall on Wednesday, when his programme comprised specimens of the classical and brilliant styles.

The Crystal Palace Saturday afternoon concerts are resumed this week, with the eleventh performance of the twenty-ninth series.

Mr. William Carter will celebrate St. Valentine's Day this (Saturday) evening by one of his grand national concerts at the Royal Albert Hall. Mr. Sims Reeves and other eminent artists are announced to appear.

Ash Wednesday will be celebrated by a grand performance of "The Messiah" by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Barnby.

The Bach Choir will give its first concert of the year next Thursday evening at St. James's Hall.

ART NOTES.

In the collection of sketches made by Mr. Pownoll Williams, now on view at Mr. McLean's Gallery in the Haymarket, there is greater variety than the artist has hitherto displayed in his work. For once, he has—partially, at least—broken away from Italy, and shows, side by side, his appreciation of the Upper Thames and of the Riviera. Our chief complaint, perhaps a strange one, is that the two districts should have so much in common—that is, on Mr. Pownoll Williams's canvas. It is pleasant to think, but difficult to believe, that the atmosphere of Mentone and Pangbourne is so similar as to represent distant outlines, evening shadows, and even foliage, with so little appreciable difference. Possibly, the exceptional summer through which we have passed last year may be the explanation of this miracle. Our other difference of opinion with Mr. P. Williams regards his treatment of light as seen through the trees, wherein he differs toto cælo (to use an appropriate expression) from the greatest masters of landscape painting in Italy, Holland, or England. We do not wish to say this in any depreciatory sense, for every artist must see with his own eyes, and not with those of any forerunner, great or small. The most ambitious work in the whole series is "The Silver Thames" (50), which, in spite of its golden haze, really admirably rendered, is not the most successful work in the room; whilst the "Mill Pool at Maple-durham" (44) just misses being a great success by the excessive strength with which the trees are rendered. When dealing with foliage on the Riviera, as in the case of "The Olive-Tree at Sunset" (30) and "On a Grey Day" (31), Mr. Pownoll Williams is more at his ease; and, although the latter suggests somewhat crudely the conventional olive-tree of stage decoration, there is no reason to suppose it to be otherwise than truthful. "Winter Calm" (11), a study of amber clouds over an amber sea, is, in all respects, a bold and original treatment of the Mediterranean as it is to be seen sometimes towards the close of a bright winter's day; and it should be compared with two other evening studies (62 and 63), which hang on the opposite wall, in each of which the artist shows great delicacy of feeling combined with deftness of hand.

At a meeting of the Royal Scottish Academy held in Edinburgh on Tuesday, Mr. Clark Stanton, sculptor, Edinburgh, was elected an Academician.

At the February examination at the Inner Temple, on the subjects in which instruction has been given by the tutors of the Inn, the masters of the Bench have awarded pupil scholarships of 100 guineas each to the undermentioned students:—Common Law, Mr. P. CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, Feb. 11.

A decided change has taken place in the tendency of the Money Market, which is now much firmer, rates having risen, mainly in response to the unfortunate turn which affairs in the Soudan have taken and to the rapid absorption of cash as the result of the revenue collections. Present appearances are, in consequence, against the realisation of the expectations lately indulged in to the effect that another reduction in the Bank rate of discount was imminent. Outside quotations have approached more closely to the official minimum, and the foreign exchanges have as a result moved in our favour, with the probability of gold being attracted to this country very shortly, as on the Continent the value of money is very low. In the Stock Exchange the general tone has been greatly influenced by the intelligence of the fall of Khartoum, and the upward movement, which had begun to assert itself, was immediately reversed on the news becoming known, a severe fall taking place nearly all down the list of securities. The Funds lost ground to the extent of fully 1 per cent, and, of course, Egyptian Government stocks suffered a material reduction, while the depreciation spread to home railways as well as to other securities. The instructions given to Lord Wolseley have, however, since restored confidence to a large extent, and some of the decline has been recovered. Amidst the general weakness, a noteworthy feature was the steadiness of Colonial Government stocks. Only 3 per cent is given for deposits at call, and 3½ per cent for money at notice, whereas at current quotations Colonial Government loans yield about 3⅞ to 4 per cent per annum.

From the statement of liabilities and assets issued by Glyn, Mills, Currie, and Co., it appears that on the 31st ult. the paid-up capital was £1,000,000; the reserve fund, £500,000; current and deposit accounts, £9,459,627; and liabilities on account of acceptances, &c., £1,167,579; making in all £10,959,627; against which there was cash in hand and at the Bank of England to the amount of £1,313,573; money at call and short notice, £1,564,000; investments, £2,757,785; discounts, &c., £5,224,269; and bank premises, £100,000. The chief point in the accounts is the large amount of investments, represented by £1,470,000 of Consols, £461,505 of other securities bearing the British guarantee, £637,680 of Indian and Colonial Government securities, and £188,600 of securities of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Among purely metropolitan banking companies, Glyn's, therefore, ranks about fourth in size. The London and Westminster comes first, the London Joint-Stock second, and the Union of London third.

Without even hinting of through whom the loss has been made, the directors of the Merchant Banking Company of London report that since July last, when an interim dividend of 3 per cent was paid, the company have suffered such a disaster that the whole reserved fund of £100,000 has been swept away, together with the profit on the year's business (say, £45,000), a balance of £13,276 left over from 1883; and there is, even after these absorptions, a debit balance to go into 1885 of £28,000, of which, however, £11,250 was paid on interim dividend. A call of £1 per share is made.

All the leading home railway companies, with the exception of the Metropolitan District, have now announced their dividends, the Midland paying 5¾ per cent per annum, compared with 6¼ for the second half of 1883; the London and North-Western, 7¼ compared with 8; the London, Chatham, and Dover their full preference dividend, as was the case for the corresponding period; the Great Northern 6 per cent per annum, or at the same rate as for the second half of 1883, and the Great Western 7 per cent per annum, compared with 7¼.

Another dividend at the rate of 12½ per cent per annum has been announced by the London General Omnibus Company, which favourable rate of distribution is rendered all the more satisfactory because of the increasing competition which the undertaking has had to contend against. That this result has only been obtained by a considerably increased service is patent by the fact that the average fare for each passenger carried was 2·04d. last half-year, compared with 2·17d. in the second half of 1883, when the dividend was 10 per cent per annum. The exceptionally low price of provender contributed in no small degree to the above result, the average cost of feeding and bedding each stud being £142 for the six months, or £6 per stud less than during the corresponding half-year. Shareholders of both omnibus and tramway companies have had a favourable half year, taken as a whole, thus forming a conspicuous exception to the general experience.

Judgment has been given in favour of the Pico to Yca bondholders with respect to their claim to priority in the distribution of certain funds accruing from the proceeds of sales of Peruvian guano. This decision is a most important one, as by it the amount left for distribution amongst the Peruvian bondholders will be very small. It has, however, been decided by the Peruvian bondholders' committee to present an appeal to the House of Lords against this decision. Peruvian stocks have naturally receded in value on this result.

Reference was made in this column last week to the financial position of several of the dock companies. Since then the Southampton Company have issued their report, from which it appears that negotiations have been in progress having for their object the construction of deeper water accommodation, in order to give better facilities to the large ships now resorting to the docks, as well as to attract others. The Corporation of Southampton have promoted a bill in Parliament to enable them to borrow money and to lend money to the Dock Company upon favourable terms, and although the shareholders have not accepted the terms, the Corporation are in the hopes that arrangements may be made which will be of mutual benefit.

Madame Essipoff, the Russian pianiste, joined several members of the Liverpool Kyrle Society last week in a concert given in the Music-Room of the School for the Blind in Hardman-street, the audience being pupils of that institution. Hardy, Cleaver, Hornby, and Vickery; recitations were given by Mr. Naftel; and Madame Essipoff's performance of varied examples of pianoforte music was followed with the keenest interest.

The marriage of Sir Henry Grattan Bellew, 5th Dragoon Guards, with Lady Sophia Forbes took place on Wednesday morning at St. Mary's Roman Catholic church, Newtownforbes, county Longford. The bride, who was given away by her father, the Earl of Granard, wore a dress of white satin, trimmed with Brussels lace, sprays of orange-blossoms, lilies of the valley, and shamrock, and a Brussels lace veil. The bridegroom wore the uniform of his regiment. The bridesmaids—Ladies Eva and Margaret Forbes, Miss Grattan Bellew, and Miss Langdale—wore pale blue plush dresses with toques to match, and gold bangles with pearl and sapphire bees, the gift of the bridegroom. The best man was Captain Shaw, 5th Dragoon Guards, who was in uniform.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, Feb. 10

A British tourist, passing along the boulevard yesterday afternoon with his wife, was surprised to see the Place de l'Opéra held by troops and police, and the foot-paths occupied by crowds of patient gapers. The British tourist inquired at a newspaper kiosk, and, as I passed, I heard him tell his wife that the woman in the kiosk had said that something was going to happen, but what it was she did not know. This seems to be a fair statement of French affairs at the present moment: something is going to happen, but nobody knows what. It is difficult even to say what has happened. Yesterday, for instance, what was the meaning of all that display of cavalry and infantry and dusky policemen. A newspaper announced some days ago that the Anarchists were to hold a "grand meeting des affames," or a "starvation meeting," on the Place de l'Opéra, on Monday; and handbills were distributed inviting the 250,000 workmen out of employ to come and exhibit their rags and misery in presence of the splendour of the rich—that is to say, at the foot of Carpeaux's group, "La Danse." The police arrested several Anarchists before Monday; and at two o'clock on the appointed day the troops were kept ready in the barracks of Paris; strong battalions of police were massed in and around the Opéra; the whole Place was occupied by infantry soldiers, placed at intervals of a yard or two, with grounded arms; while a squadron of cavalry was stationed in the courtyard of the Opéra. This display of force caused people to imagine that something was really about to happen, and the crowd grew thicker and thicker; only it was not a crowd of Anarchists or of workmen out of work. It was a crowd of idlers, boulevardiers, gapers, and badauds of all kinds—one of those essentially Parisian crowds such as you see lolling over the bridges on the Seine watching an old woman washing a poodle. The Anarchists made absolutely no manifestation. At five o'clock the police received orders to disperse the crowd: then there was a rush and some hooting and hissing, and a certain amount of damage done in the neighbouring cafés. At half-past six the crowd was charged by the cavalry, sabre in hand, and the boulevards cleared from the Opéra as far as the Crédit Lyonnaise. What little manifestation there really was took place elsewhere. In the Rue Lafayette a band of some few score revolutionaries broke the window of a gun-shop and stole half a dozen revolvers; in the Rue d'Allemagne a baker's shop was pillaged, and on the Boulevard Poissonnière a chair was flung through the window of a clock-shop. The manifestation of yesterday was made not by the Anarchists, but by the Government, which at the end of the day scored some forty arrests. In reality, the only people who profited by the events of yesterday were the keepers of the cafés in the neighbourhood of the Opéra. Paris, of course, will suffer, for although the sight of cavalry and infantry charging the mob may reassure the French bourgeois, it will most decidedly frighten away the foreigner, who is not accustomed to street fighting and to shops suddenly closed when the projectiles begin to fly.

Unfortunately, this abortive manifestation leaves matters precisely where they were. Thousands of men are out of work, the streets of Paris are infested by beggars, and the amount of misery here is enormous. The serious revolutionaries naturally take advantage of this state of things to maintain a constant state of alarm; and further manifestations are announced as lugubrious interludes in the Carnival.

The discussion of the bill relative to the proposed tax on cereals and imported cattle occupied the greater part of the time of the Chamber last week, and promises to be very lengthy, for no less than forty-nine orators have put their names down. The debate naturally turns upon the questions of Free Trade and Protection. Hitherto, the only point upon which all are agreed is that agriculture in France is in a desperate condition, and that some means must be found to enable the farmers to continue their trade, in spite of foreign competition and in spite of the increasing dearness of labour, owing to the migration of the country people into the large towns. The Parliamentary Commission has proposed a duty of three francs on every hectolitre of imported grain.

In the course of the sitting of Thursday the Chamber discussed a proposition of M. Tony Revillon relative to a grant of twenty-five millions for distribution amongst the workmen out of employ. The demand of "urgency" was refused by 237 votes against 112, and the proposal referred to the Budget Committee. A resolution of M. Revillon, requesting the Government to begin immediately the public works provided for by the Budget of 1885, was adopted unanimously.

The pale-faced newspaper boys have been making the boulevard re-echo during the past few days with the great victory of Lang-Son, and some of the journalists have had the bad taste to contrast the doubtful successes of the French in Tonquin with the reverses of the English in Egypt. Another specimen of bad taste is a melodrama in five acts, "Les Français au Tonkin," played last night at the Théâtre du Château d'Eau. The traitor is an Englishman; the hero of the piece is Commander Rivière, whose remains were buried in Paris only a few days ago; and the principal scenes are the taking of Sontay and Hanoi. This ignoble parody of the French Army has, of course, nothing in common either with literature or with dramatic art.

M. Edmond du Sommerard, member of the Institute, curator of the Cluny Museum, died last week, at the age of sixty-eight. He was the son and successor of Alexander du Sommerard, who, at a time when Greek and Roman art was alone accepted in France, devoted his fortune and thirty years of his life to collecting objects of the Middle Ages and of the Renaissance, and forming that unique collection which now constitutes the Cluny Museum. M. Edmund du Sommerard was an archæologist and antiquary of great distinction, an active member of all the great artistic societies of Paris, and Commissioner-General of France at the Universal Exhibition of London and Vienna.

In anticipation of further disturbances on the part of the Voltairian students, M. Caro's philosophy lecture at the Sorbonne has been suspended.

The British Chamber of Commerce held its annual banquet at the Hôtel Continental last night. Amongst the guests were MM. Leroy-Beaulieu, Jules Simon, and Rouvier, Minister of Commerce, and other eminent French Free-traders. M. Leroy-Beaulieu remarked that commercial crises occurred periodically both under the régime of Free Trade and under that of Protection, and that at the present moment Protectionist countries, like Spain and Russia, were more severely tried than Free Trade countries. M. Jules Simon hoped, in no distant future, to see Europe transformed into one vast workshop, in which each nation would have its specialty.

LATE SIR R. J. PHILLIMORE, BART., D.C.L.

CONDUCTOR OF SUPPLIES A. C. JEWELL,
KILLED IN THE SOUDAN.

LATE COLONEL R. WADESON, V.C.,
LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF CHELSEA HOSPITAL.

THE LATE COLONEL WADESON, V.C.

The death of the Lieutenant-Governor of Chelsea Hospital, Colonel Richard Wadeson, V.C., is much regretted by the inmates of that institution, and by his old military comrades and other personal friends. He was a thorough soldier. He came of an old English family, but, being unable to purchase a commission in the Army, he entered the ranks of the 75th Regiment, now the 1st Battalion Gordon Highlanders. Owing solely to personal merit, he rapidly rose through the non-commissioned grades, and attained the rank of Sergeant-Major. The outbreak of the Indian Mutiny found him in that responsible position; and the manner in which his regiment behaved at the battle of Budlee-ke-Serai, in May, 1857, proved how admirably he must have done his duty. After that fierce engagement, in which the 75th charged and captured a battery, the regiment moved on to take part in the memorable siege of Delhi, and on June 2 a commission was bestowed on Wadeson. Not long afterwards he won the Victoria Cross by an act of signal gallantry, in bringing in from the front, under heavy fire, a wounded soldier. At the storming of Delhi, Ensign Wadeson was severely wounded, but soon recovered, and took part in the subsequent operations in which his regiment was engaged. He obtained his lieutenancy in September, 1857; his captaincy in December, 1864; his majority in July, 1872; and his lieutenant-colonelcy and command of the regiment in December, 1875, only eighteen years from the date of his first commission. During the greater part of his service as a subaltern, he filled the position of adjutant, and so acquitted himself as to win the esteem of all, while rendering his corps equal to any in drill and discipline. This reputation he fully maintained during his five years' service as regimental commanding officer. Equally popular with officers and men, he acquired for the 75th the character of being one of the smartest regiments in the Army, and when he had to leave, under the compulsory retirement regulation, the feeling of regret was universal. It showed the estimation in which Colonel Wadeson was held that the Duke of Cambridge bestowed the post of Lieutenant-Governor of Chelsea Hospital on him without solicitation, direct or indirect. In that appointment, as throughout his previous career, Colonel Wadeson earned the highest approbation. The funeral service at Chelsea Hospital, previously to the interment at the West Brompton Cemetery, was attended by Field Marshal Sir Patrick Grant, with staff officers in uniform representing different military departments, and by the Chelsea pensioners and old soldiers of his regiment.

THE CHURCH AND EMIGRATION.

A large and influential society has been incorporated in connection with the Church of England for the purpose of dealing practically, on a commercial basis, with the pressing question of emigration. The Rev. G. Prothero, Canon of Westminster, Rector of Whippingham, and Chaplain to the Queen, is the chairman; and Sir William Vincent, Bart., deputy chairman; and amongst the members of the council of administration is the Rev. J. Bridger, the emigrants' Chaplain, St. Nicholas' Church, Liverpool. The operations of the society will, in the first instance, be commenced in Canada, and a large quantity of land has been secured on very advantageous terms in Manitoba. It is near the railway, and has been selected by a practical north-western farmer (a Yorkshireman), who has also been persuaded to act as the local manager. The emigrants who may take advantage of the proposals of the society will be placed upon the land and upon homesteads within its area, and will be assisted to establish themselves, and to cultivate their lands. Out of the capital subscribed a tenth portion will be set apart to provide the settlers with religious ministrations under the control of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Another object the society has in view is to establish an agricultural training college for the benefit of young men of means desirous of settling in the country, and of acquiring, before doing so, a practical knowledge of agriculture. Mr. Bridger sails to Canada with the first party of settlers on April 23, and, as in previous years, will be followed by other detachments.

The Queen, patron of the Royal Fund for the Relief of the Orphans of Sea Fishermen, has sent to the chairman, Mr. Birkbeck, M.P., £200 to the fund, towards which the president, the Prince of Wales, has also contributed one hundred guineas.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

The lamentable tidings of the fall of Khartoum through treachery, with the swiftly succeeding news of General Gordon's death and the rutiless massacre of the inhabitants and of the faithful residue of the garrison, have nerved the Government to a great effort. Lord Wolseley's application for Reinforcements is to be instantly complied with. Inasmuch as the firm attitude assumed by the Ministry at this crisis has been misrepresented, it is essential that their position should be made clear. Their latest spokesman, Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, now a Cabinet Minister and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, on Tuesday night delivered an admirable calm address to the Manchester Reform Club, by the members of which the right hon. gentleman was entertained at dinner. Mr. Trevelyan said, amid the cheers of his hearers:—

> The Mahdi and his followers, and those who may be his followers to-morrow but are not now, belong to a race and a class who have their fine qualities, but whose politics are war, and nothing but war. The security of our brave soldiers, the loyalty of the tribes which are wavering, the lives of those who have joined our cause, the safety of Egypt, for which we are responsible, and far wider and more general interests than these, which it is not necessary to indicate, all depend upon our military position and our military performances. We did not seek the quarrel. If the Mahdi had behaved as any civilised Power would behave, and have let the Egyptian garrisons go, we should not, for aught I know, have crossed each other's paths. But now that the sword has been drawn against a fanatic Oriental enemy, we cannot put up with failure. We have the most perfect confidence in Lord Wolseley. His plans will be adopted heartily and promptly, and all the means which he requires will be placed freely at his disposal.

The boldest course in a military sense may in the end prove the most merciful in the Soudan. Most Englishmen will disapprove the timid counsels offered by Mr. Leonard Courtney and Mr. John Morley, who, the former at Torpoint and the latter at Glasgow, virtually advised the Government to order the withdrawal of our forces from the Upper Nile, in the teeth of the undoubted fact that General Gordon—to rescue whom Lord Wolseley undertook the Expedition—has either been killed in Khartoum or is a prisoner of the Mahdi. No craven policy will at this juncture be tolerated by the country. The martial ring of the Earl of Rosebery's energetic speech on Monday to the Epsom and Leatherhead Liberal Association was quite in accordance with the prevailing feeling. England's blood is up. When a fanatical enemy has felt and acknowledged our power—that will be the time to treat with the False Prophet as to the future of the Soudan.

The Marquis of Salisbury hastens home to consult with the leaders of the Conservative Party as to the course to be followed in criticising the Soudan action of the Government. Meantime, Mr. Gibson, addressing a Dublin meeting of Conservatives on Saturday, directly charged the Ministry with being responsible for the fall of Khartoum and General Gordon's fate. It was pleasanter to hear the Marquis of Ripon on Tuesday, fresh from the hearty Yorkshire welcome home, calmly replying in London to the congratulatory address of the Indian Reform Association, and to his confident assurance that Lord Dufferin would act in a fair and liberal spirit to all classes in India.

The First Division of the Court of Session, Edinburgh, has upheld a codicil to the will of the late Mr. Stirling Crawfurd, of Milton, by which his widow, the Dowager Duchess of Montrose, is held entitled to a legacy of £120,000.

A large and influential company assembled at Elsenham Hall on the 5th inst. to witness a sale of highly bred Shire horses, the property of Mr. Walter Gilbey. The Elsenham Hall Stud has in ten years attained a very high position. During the spring and summer months of 1884 animals from this stud won forty-seven prizes at leading shows in England; and these included three champion prizes, four special premiums, twenty-seven first, and thirteen second prizes. The announcement, therefore, that Mr. W. Gilbey would sell the bulk of his young and prize-winning horses attracted great interest, and brought to Elsenham a company numbering over 1500. Forty animals were catalogued, and the sale thoughout was remarkably successful. The bidding was very spirited, and for the choicer animals there was keen competition. The forty animals realised £6784, or an average of £169 12s.

THE MODERN PERSEUS AND ANDROMEDA.
WITH PROFUSE APOLOGIES TO MR. POYNTER, R.A.

The above beautiful allegory aptly illustrates the position of a large portion of afflicted humanity at the present age. The Andromeda of to-day, or it may be her husband, or a sister, a cousin, or an aunt of the interesting damsel, is assailed by the pestilerous breath of the remorseless demon, Disease; she faints and droops under its baneful influence, but, being chained to the rocks of Prejudice, Ignorance and Incredulity, she is unable to resist or impede the advance of the monster, who threatens each moment to enfold her in his deadly grasp. From the summit of the rocks the modern Æsculapius has exhausted the puny armoury of his profession; one by one he has hurled phial and globule at the approaching monster, but without succeeding in checking his onward approach, and, alas! many of the missiles have fallen short of their aim, and have sadly maimed and distressed the already grievously afflicted victim. In vain she implores her would-be deliverer to employ more potent and more certain weapons; Æsculapius knows them not, and the unhappy damsel is on the point of resigning herself to her apparently inevitable fate, when, lo! there approaches from the distance a figure of commanding presence, who bears aloft a weapon of the highest finish and most unerring precision, fresh from the prolific armoury of science. The Perseus of the Allegory, at whose approach the demon has hurriedly retreated, hands Andromeda the charm (bearing the mystic inscription "Electropathic Belt"), bids her wear it, and promises that it will act as a charm against the advance of all such insidious enemies. Andromeda, who has already revived under the magic influence of the stranger's presence, disengages herself from the fetters which had entangled her, and from which, indeed, she might easily have released herself long since had she possessed sufficient courage to persevere in the effort; gratefully accepts the proffered amulet; pours out her gratitude and thanks to her deliverer; bids Æsculapius with his phials and globules begone, and resolves that henceforth she will rely for protection on the priceless treasure she has become the possessor of.

Of course, it is impossible to depict each incident of the above allegory in the one sketch, and the charge for advertising in the "Illustrated London News" is so high that it is equally impossible, from a financial standpoint, to illustrate each incident by means of a separate picture; but the intelligent reader will grasp the moral at a glance, and he or she will forthwith proceed to provide himself or herself with an ELECTROPATHIC BELT, which is certified by the medical profession, and by many thousands of the general public, to be an infallible remedy for Sciatica, Lumbago, Rheumatism, Kidney Derangement, Constipation, Loss of Nerve Power, Deficient Vital Energy, Asthma, Bronchitis, Epilepsy, Paralysis, Hysteria, Indigestion, Sluggish Liver, &c.

The price is only 21s., and it is to be obtained by sending a Post-Office Order or Cheque for that amount, payable to C. B. HARNESS, and crossed "London and County Bank," to the

CRÊPE IMPÉRIAL.
FOR MOURNING WEAR.

"MESSRS. JAY, of Regent-street, London, have a novel manufacture for black. It is all wool, and yet looks exactly like crepe, as it has the crinkled or crimped surface which is inseparable from that fabric. It is solid and most durable, being free from the elasticity of the more perishable silk crêpe, which it so closely resembles, and yet it is glossy. It appears under the name of 'Crepe Imperial,' and is made up effectively into costumes for deep mourning, when it is not compulsory to trim with crêpe. The firm should be congratulated on introducing a fabric which will answer for the deepest mourning dress, and will wear as long as the mourner elects to use it."—Extract from "The Queen, the Lady's Newspaper."

CHAPTER XIII.

LADY ST. AUSTELL.

By far the greatest man in the neighbourhood of Polruth was Sydney George, third Earl of St. Austell and eighth Viscount Blaise; but his local greatness was due rather to the fact that he owned nearly the whole of the surrounding district than to any personal qualities that he might possess; for of these not much was known to Cornish folk. He spent but a very short time out of each year at Blaise Castle, having estates in other parts of England which he preferred; and during that short time his tall, bony figure, his hook nose, and purple whiskers were seldom exhibited to an admiring tenantry. In London, on the other hand, as well as at Newmarket, Melton, Cowes, and other resorts of fashionable society, he was, if not great, at all events famous. All his life long he had gone in lavishly for every form of amusement which costs money, and, although he had been, upon the whole, successful on the turf, the racing stud which he still kept up in his old age must have swallowed a very much larger annual amount than it returned. He had, however, always been wealthy, and was moreover declared by those who had reason to know to be an exceedingly sharp man of business. It is probable that the sums which he lost at play during the early years of the century were not so enormous as was currently reported.

But indeed many reports were current respecting this old nobleman which, if looked into, might have been found to be untrue or exaggerated. Fame, when once she takes to blowing the trumpet of any individual with regard to some special quality, is apt to blow so loudly that false notes must needs come out every now and then; and just as all witty sayings used to be attributed to Sydney Smith, and most solemn platitudes to poor Benjamin Franklin, so Lord St. Austell, having established a reputation for phenomenal wickedness, had fathered upon him many crimes of which he was, perhaps, innocent. The balance might have satisfied him; for in truth there was hardly a vice in the exercise of which he had not shown himself an adept; but if any unfounded accusations were brought against him, it was not he who would think of refuting or complaining of them. He was well aware that he passed for being the greatest sinner in England, and though he never boasted of his by-gone iniquities, he took an intense silent delight in the name that he had earned for himself. A sceptic as to religion, and a cynic as to morality, he had devoted the whole of his long life to the one object of gratifying his personal desires, and had never stepped aside to serve a friend or to avenge himself upon a foe—neither of these ends being, in his opinion, calculated to repay the trouble of achievement. Why such a man should have been popular it would be rather hard to say; for he possessed no single virtue, except that of physical courage; but that he did enjoy popularity of a certain kind is undeniable. He had been three times married. His first two wives, it was said, had succumbed to his fascinations, as a great many other people's wives had done, had married him out of pure affection, and had died broken-hearted on discovering that other people's wives interested him considerably more than his own.

The third and last Lady St. Austell had not accepted the coronet offered to her from any such motives, and was in no danger of incurring so melancholy a fate. It might have seemed like a piece of poetical justice that this old reprobate should have found himself at the end of his career linked to a partner many years younger than himself, whose flirtations were common talk; but Lord St. Austell, as it happened, was quite cognizant of his wife's peculiarities, and didn't care a bit. She amused him; which was more than either of her predecessors had been able to do. He took a malicious kind of pleasure in watching her, in seeing how far she would venture to go, and in condoling with her when she failed—as she occasionally did—to capture the particular admirer whom she coveted. Sometimes he succeeded in making her angry by leading her to the glass and pointing out that she was growing stout and losing her complexion—which was great fun. Sometimes, too, he frightened her; and that was better fun still. He knew very well that she would never overstep the thin boundary-line which separates mere indiscretion from downright folly. Perhaps he would not have minded very much if she had; but he liked to let her feel, from time to time, that he had the whip hand of her, and would crack the whip for the satisfaction of seeing her scared.

After all, he knew very little about her; for they were seldom together. He thought her a silly sort of woman, and so, no doubt, she was; but he had not troubled himself to examine closely into her character, nor had he any suspicion that she was in reality a philosopher of his own school. Heriot, who had been all his life acquainted with this thoroughly egotistical, yet not unamiable lady, found her an even more amusing study than her husband did. If he had no very profound esteem for her, he could not help liking her, and she, on her side, honoured him with something as nearly approaching friendship as her nature could compass. Heriot was not a man with whom it was possible to flirt; so she had long fallen into the habit of treating him as one outside the pale of the emotions and excitements for which she lived, and was wont to confide to him, with delightful candour, all the details of these. Her emotions were genuine; she had learnt the trick of stimulating them. Fortunately, they were also shallow, and did not "delve the parallels on beauty's brow" which she dreaded more than anything else in the world. As the sense of humour was developed in her to a greater extent than is common among women, Heriot and she sometimes had an unexpected laugh together, which refreshed them both.

Almost the first thing that she said to him, after he arrived at Blaise Castle from Cardrew, was: "You find me in the depth of despair. I don't know when in my life before I have felt so miserably low-spirited."

"Dear me!" said Heriot. "Has anything happened to Charley, or Jimmy, or whatever his name was?"

"Johnny. Johnny Spencer. You know what a charming young fellow he was. Always so cheery and pleasant and"——

"And so devoted to you. But why do you speak of him in the past tense? Is he dead?"

Lady St. Austell sighed. "No; but I am sorry to say that I have had to marry him to an heiress. It has left me very much depressed, though the match was an excellent one as far as that goes, and you can easily understand how it became necessary. He was beginning to be so disagreeable that I felt things couldn't go on much longer as they had been doing."

The emphasised pronoun referred to Lord St. Austell, whom her ladyship was often pleased to represent as a jealous tyrant.

"You will have to get another," said Heriot.

"Ah, no! I shall never be as fond of anyone again as I was of him. Why do you laugh? I suppose you think yourself much wiser than I am because you have never chosen to advance a step beyond friendship with any woman. Well, you are wrong. You miss the greatest blessing of existence."

"Very likely. But as Nature has treated me rather unkindly in the matter of features, and as my health won't allow me to be a marrying man, perhaps I may be consulting my peace better by letting love alone."

"What on earth has marriage to say to the question? Or features either, for that matter? You might spend some very happy hours, if you chose; but you don't choose, because you are afraid of losing your peace. Well, I grant you that your peace would have to go for a time; but supposing it did? Is peace such a treasure? If peace were all one wanted, one might as well be an old cow at once. I don't recommend you to fall in love with a girl, for girls naturally think about establishing themselves, and you are well off; but surely among your acquaintances you might find some married woman whom you could care for."

"Wouldn't that be rather immoral?" asked Heriot.

"Certainly not. You are not going to call me immoral, I hope! Now, you know how perfectly innocent all my little affairs of that kind have been. Disinterested too—as I have proved by my behaviour in Johnny Spencer's case. I have never tried to keep myself from indulging in a platonic love for anyone towards whom I have felt drawn, and I never will. Do you think that does them or me any harm? Harm!—why it does us the greatest possible good. It brings out all the noblest qualities of our characters; it enables us to forget the dreary boredom of everyday life; and, for my own part, even if the individual doesn't happen to care for me, I am always glad to have the power of feeling such a pure and delightful emotion."

"In other words, it is the emotion that you love and not the individual."

"Well, I love the individual for giving me the emotion. Believe me, there is nothing else in life that is worth the trouble. I have tried most things; so I can speak with some authority. Do you know, I remind myself very much of a character in a novel that I was reading the other day, called 'Society,' or some such name. Have you seen it?"

"If you mean 'Satiety,'" answered Heriot, "it is by a friend of mine, a man named Vidal, who is in Cornwall at this moment."

"You don't say so!" cried Lady St. Austell, with quickened interest. "Is he young? Is he good-looking? Is he the sort of person whom one could ask to one's house?"

"He is young, he is good-looking, and he is the sort of person who would be calculated to reflect credit upon his hostess," replied Heriot, gravely. "Also he is engaged to be married. His future wife is the only daughter of my friends the Irvines."

"I should like to meet him, all the same," said Lady St. Austell, pensively. "So he is going to marry that pretty Miss Irvine, is he? He might amuse me. Do you think he would amuse me?"

"I dare say he would," answered Heriot; "only, as he is engaged"——

"Yes, yes, I know;—don't be absurd. We will have the Irvines to dinner one day next week. I don't much like the old lady, because she always bothers one so for subscriptions, but we really ought to show them some civility. Now I come to think of it, I believe we haven't asked them to dinner for two years."

The result of this conversation was that Mrs. Irvine received a friendly note the next morning, in which Lady St. Austell congratulated her upon her daughter's approaching marriage, and begged her, as well as Mr. and Miss Irvine to "join a few friends at dinner" on the following Thursday. "And we shall be so glad," continued the writer, "if you can persuade Mr. Vidal to come with you. Please tell him that he needs no introduction to me, for I already know him through his very clever book, which I have read with the greatest interest."

"Now, this is most fortunate!" exclaimed Mrs. Irvine, after reading the above sentences aloud and laying down the note upon the breakfast-table. "I was just wondering how I could manage to get hold of Lord St. Austell, and put in a word for those poor fishermen. I am a little bit afraid of him, I confess; but it would never do to let such an opportunity slip. Of course we must accept. You will come, won't you?" she added, turning to Vidal, who was now staying in the house.

"Oh, certainly," he answered. He had not been insensible to Lady St. Austell's flattering reference to himself, and was rather surprised when Clare confided to him afterwards that she had hoped he would decline.

"Why? Would you prefer to be without my company?" he asked, smiling.

"You need not ask that question," she replied; "but don't you think it was rather impertinent of her to invite you in that way? It sounded as if—as if"——

"As if what?"

"Well—as if she only wanted you to come because you had written a book that amused her."

Vidal laughed. "But, do you know," he said, "I don't find that an insulting reason. Of course, you and I are aware that my acquaintance is an inestimable boon in itself; but we can't expect Lady St. Austell to have discovered that, since she has never been fortunate enough to see me. If reading my book has given her a desire to see me, why shouldn't she say so?"

"I am sure you won't like her," said Clare. "She is a horrid old thing, who makes herself up with powder and paint and has very disagreeable, artificial sort of manners. Even Mr. Heriot, who never will say a word against any of his friends, admits that she is bad style."

However, Vidal was unable to admit the justice of this criticism when he found himself face to face with the subject of it. The lady who received him at Blaise Castle was certainly not old, nor—so far as could be seen in the dim light—was she painted; and if her manner was artificial, it was far from being disagreeable. She had a vivacious little face, with bright eyes, a retroussé nose, and very red lips. It was not exactly pretty; but it was decidedly attractive. Her figure had probably been prettier some years back: it was now somewhat too full for beauty.

These details he noted as he followed the Irvines into a spacious room, full of people. Lady St. Austell did not detain him, having other guests to welcome, and being more alive than her husband was to the advisability of keeping upon good terms with the squirearchy. The "few friends" of whom she had spoken in her note of invitation, in reality comprised every decent person who dwelt within a twelve-mile radius of the Castle, and it was easy to foresee that the impending dinner would be as long and dull as such overgrown entertainments always are. Vidal, who at this particular period of his life had eyes for only one person, was not interested in the assemblage, and found the conversation of the lady whom he subsequently took into the dining-room extremely tedious. The same causes which prevented him from doing justice to the company interfered with his appreciation of the dinner, which was nevertheless an excellent one; for Lord St. Austell was not the man to put up with indifferent cooking.

"I'll tell you what to eat," Vidal heard him saying confidentially to the stout dowager who sat on his right hand. "Put yourself into my hands, and you needn't be afraid of taking anything that will disagree with you. I suppose you are like me and suffer from a fit of gout every now and then, don't you? You look as if you did."

Lord St. Austell had a peculiarly rude way of saying rude things when he was in a bad humour, and country dinner parties always put him in a bad humour. His neighbours were very much afraid of him, and indeed he looked a sufficiently terrible old man, sitting there, at the end of that long vista of fruit and flowers and priceless china, like a living memento mori in the midst of so much luxury. His pallid visage, his unnaturally black whiskers, the eye-glass which gleamed when the light fell upon it, and the long teeth which gleamed always, preached as pithy a sermon and diffused as effective a chill around him as any mummy at an Egyptian feast could have done. When he spoke (he had a high-pitched, ringing voice), everybody stopped talking and quaked; because it was impossible to tell what dreadful thing he might not be going to say; and if there was an episode in your past life which you desired to bury in oblivion, you might be pretty sure that Lord St. Austell had heard about it, and would not neglect a chance of referring to it.

At the other extremity of the table, things were more cheerful. Of Lady St. Austell no one had need to be frightened; and although she may have been quite as much bored as her husband, she did not avenge her wrongs, as he usually did, upon the first person who came to hand. Round about her, therefore, there was a brisk cackle of voices and laughter which spread to a certain distance. Clare, sitting about midway between the gaiety and the gloom, had for neighbour a young man who informed her that he was staying in the house and hardly knew a soul at the table. He appeared anxious to correct this ignorance—having, perhaps, some difficulty in finding topics likely to interest a country-bred maiden—and she enlightened him as to the names and residences of his fellow-guests, which pretty well exhausted all that there was to be said about them. But when he inquired who the fair-haired man opposite was, she answered, colouring slightly, and not without a certain intonation of pride, "That is Mr. Vidal."

"You speak as if he were the show man of the district," remarked her questioner.

"He does not live here," replied Clare. "He is the Mr. Vidal, you know." Indeed, she supposed that every person of ordinary education must have heard of this celebrated author.

"Oh, yes," said her neighbour, vaguely, "very stupid of me; but somehow that doesn't seem to convey much idea to my mind. Who is The Vidal when he's at home?"

"He is the Mr. Vidal who writes. But perhaps you don't read books," said Clare, with a touch of disdain.

"Well, not very much. I read the papers; and as I am an idle man, that is almost all I can find time for. What is Mr. Vidal's line? Science, history, travels, or poetry? Poetry, I should think, by the look of him."

"He writes novels," answered Clare. "That is, he has written one; but he has been a contributor to the best magazines for some time, I believe."

"Oh, novels? Then I may make acquaintance with his productions some day. I like a good novel—only it must be a good one. Whyte-Melville's, for instance: Whyte-Melville knew what he was writing about. Some of these authors—upon my word, I can't think where they find the cheek to publish their rubbish! Why, only the other day, as I was coming down here, I bought a novel to read in the train, and in the very first chapter I came to something about pheasant-shooting in September. Well; I thought perhaps that was only a slip of the pen. I said to myself, 'Don't let's be too hard on the poor chap,' and I read on. But, if you'll believe me, I hadn't got through a dozen pages before I came to a yachting scene where the hero is represented as beating up a narrow channel against the wind, and singing out to his skipper to gybe! Well now, you know, I do call that just a little bit too bad. I don't pretend to criticise grammar or style; but it does seem to me that a man ought to have some elementary knowledge of his subjects before he sits down to write a book."

"I don't think Mr. Vidal makes such mistakes," said Clare.

"Doesn't he? You seem to take great interest in him. Well, I dare say he's a clever fellow, and he's good-looking enough, anyhow. I suppose that is why how revered hostess has been making eyes at him ever since we sat down."

The poor man meant no harm. He could not tell that his fair neighbour was engaged to Mr. Vidal, and he was a good deal taken aback when she turned upon him with sudden fierceness, exclaiming: "Making eyes at him! I can't believe that even she would be so—so disgusting as that! If you are a friend of hers, you ought not to say such things about her."

Clare's own eyes were flashing, and her cheeks had become pink. Her interlocutor, who began to have an inkling of the state of affairs, could not help answering maliciously: "As I am a friend of hers, I know her little ways, and I can assure you that she is a most dangerous person. When she makes eyes at a man it is generally all up with him. But you need not feel alarmed about Mr. Vidal. He doesn't know what an impression he has produced; he hasn't even glanced at her. Perhaps he has found someone more agreeable to look at."

Clare perceived that she had made herself ridiculous, and was proportionately ashamed; but, although she immediately changed the subject, she did not succeed in banishing it from her mind. During the rest of the dinner, she was preoccupied and uneasy, and afterwards, in the drawing-room, when she saw Lady St. Austell bearing down upon Adrian, she felt that painful constriction of the heart which only a swift pang of jealousy can produce.

The law of our being, which throws us poor mortals upon the world with certain hereditary tendencies, infirmities, defects, and so on, and leaves us to make the best we can of the imbroglio, had not spared Clare Irvine any more than it has spared the humble writer and the respected reader of these words. Like the rest of us, she was imperfect, and it must be confessed that the sweetness of her disposition was somewhat marred by what, after all, is not so much a vice as a misfortune. Jealousy is no more to be fought against than the toothache—the utmost that can be accomplished in the case of either malady is to conceal it—but what adds bitterness to the former is that those who suffer from it are as often as not aware that their sufferings are wholly irrational. Nothing, for example, could have been more absurd upon the face of it than that Clare should object to see a man who adored her conversing for a matter of ten minutes with a stout lady whose charms were on the wane, and whom he might very probably not encounter a second time in the course of his life. Yet she did object; and indeed it was perhaps just as well that she could not overhear the dialogue which was taking place at the end of that long and dimly-lighted room.

"Mr. Vidal," Lady St. Austell began, "I have a crow to pluck with you. I want to know what you mean by putting me into a book."

"I don't think I need defend myself against that accusation, Lady St. Austell," answered Vidal; though he knew what she meant, and was secretly pleased that the fidelity of his sketch should have been recognised. How could I have written about you when I have never had the happiness of meeting you until this evening?"

"You must have heard of me, then—from Mr. Heriot, perhaps. Oh, I assure you I know myself when I see my face in the glass; I have no illusions. The lady in your novel is a portrait of me, and a very unflattering portrait too. Well; I will forgive you, if you will make haste and write another book as amusing. But now, tell me, why do you attack women of the world with such acrimony? What have we done to you that you should be so severe upon us?"

"I dare say your shoulders are broad enough to bear my attacks," answered Vidal, smiling, and then bethought himself that he might have hit upon a happier phrase; for, in truth, Lady St. Austell's shoulders had lost the gracefulness of proportion that they had once possessed.

But she went on, without heeding him: "You quarrel with our ways of killing time; but you don't seem to consider that time must be killed somehow, and that we haven't so many means of doing that as you have. I suppose you are like all men: you believe that the world was created for you, and that we were only put into it as an afterthought."

"The Book of Genesis lends some support to that theory," observed Vidal. "At the same time, I should be an ardent upholder of women's rights if I could only find out exactly what they were. What I do venture to contend for is that both men and women might find something better to do with time than to kill it."

"Ah, yes; that has been put into rhyme, hasn't it? 'Teach the orphan boy to read, and teach the orphan girl to sew,' &c., &c. Praiseworthy, but not exciting; and excitement is what we require. You take care to have plenty of it for yourselves, I notice; only you can't admit that your wives and daughters may have the same cravings that you have. What a fortunate thing it is that most of you have a blind faith in your own wives and daughters, and that, unless they are very stupid indeed, they can always manage to amuse themselves without letting you into their secrets! How is it that you don't understand that human nature is human nature all the world over?"

"All women are not alike," remarked Vidal.

"They are more alike than you think for, perhaps. Just now, I know, there is one woman whom you consider immeasurably superior to the rest of us, and I don't wonder at that. She is very pretty, and probably very charming too, when you know her. Tell me about her; I like listening to lovers' rhapsodies."

It may be taken for granted that Lady St. Austell did not really enjoy a form of conversation which has never yet been found enjoyable by man or woman; but she spoke with a certain appearance of sincerity and drew rather nearer to her companion, smiling up into his face and throwing back her head, with a slight inclination to one side, in a way that she had. Her closed fan just touched his coat-sleeve; the diamonds in her hair and about her neck dazzled the eyes of the young man, who, if the truth must be told, was a little bit flattered at having been singled out for so conspicuous a share of his hostess's attentions. He did not rhapsodise, as he had been requested to do, but he tried to be agreeable and to say some clever things; and possibly he succeeded. At any rate, the colloquy lasted for some time; and Clare, watching it all, felt her soul disquieted within her.

Out of the four people whom the Irvines' carriage bore away into the night, shortly afterwards, one was silent and depressed, one was sleepy, and two were highly elated.

"I have got ten pounds out of him," Mrs. Irvine was saying triumphantly. "It isn't handsome, considering what his income is; but with his name to head my list, I shall do tolerably well, I hope, and really he was not nearly as uncivil as I expected him to be. Lady St. Austell was most friendly. She said such nice things about you both, and she is coming over to luncheon some day soon. You and she have arranged it all, have you not, Adrian?"

"She told me she was anxious to explore Polruth," answered Vidal. "It seems that she has seen very little of her husband's property in these parts, and she wanted to know whether I would show her all the objects of interest; but I said I thought Clare was more capable of undertaking that task than I."

"If Lady St. Austell discovers any objects of interest in Polruth, it is certain that I shall not be one of them," observed Clare; but Adrian did not notice the dryness of her intonation.

"The chief object of interest to Lady St. Austell, in Polruth or elsewhere, will always be Lady St. Austell," he rejoined, laughing; "but I confess that she is an object of interest to me too. I found her very entertaining, and there is an absence of humbug about her which rises almost to the level of a virtue."

"I have always thought that there was a great deal that was nice in her," said good-natured Mrs. Irvine; "and although she has not been particularly neighbourly until now, I shall be very glad if she likes to begin."

But in this expression of kindly feeling Mrs. Irvine was not seconded by her daughter.

GLASGOW INSTITUTE OF THE FINE ARTS.

The twenty-fourth annual Exhibition of Works of Modern Artists, held in the galleries of this Institution in Sauchiehall-street, was opened to the public on Tuesday, the 3rd inst. The merit of the pictures exhibited is rather above the average, and this is due not only to the works sent on loan, a feature of this exhibition which adds greatly to its interest, but also, and in a high degree, to those by contemporary and local artists, who, by their choice of subjects in the various branches of landscape and portraiture, and their artistic mode of treatment, have certainly enhanced their reputation and presented a real treat to the lovers of art in the west of Scotland.

Captain George L. Sulivan, R.N., has been awarded the good-service pension of £150 a year, vacant by the retirement of Captain W. B. Grant on the 29th ult.

Lord Deas has tendered his resignation as a Judge of the Court of Session in Scotland, having been absent from the Bench owing to ill-health since March last. He is in his eighty-first year, was called to the Scottish Bar in 1828, and has been on the Bench wellnigh thirty-two years.

The January volume of that useful reprint of the masterpieces of literature, "Morley's Universal Library" (Routledge and Sons), contains Hobbes's "Leviathan"; the February volume, Butler's "Hudibras"; while the March volume will contain descriptions of three ideal commonwealths—Moore's "Utopia," Bacon's "New Atlantis," and Campanella's "City of the Sun."

The Prince of Wales, as president of the Colonial and Indian Exhibition of 1886, has appointed as a finance committee for the exclusive purpose of administering the finances in connection with the exhibition:—Sir John Rose, G.C.M.G., chairman; Sir George C. M. Birdwood, C.S.I.; Mr. Edward Birkbeck, M.P.; Sir Barrow Helbert Ellis, K.C.S.I.; and Sir W. Charles Sargeaunt, K.C.M.G.

Ten thousand Board School children were last week entertained at Leicester, by the Mayor, Mr. Israel Hart, to the pantomime of "Jack the Giant Killer," at the Theatre Royal. The children were liberally supplied with refreshments, and the Mayor, who was accompanied by the Mayoress, addressed the children as to the importance of industry and enterprise in promoting the national welfare. Special precautions were adopted to ensure safety.

The Duke of Westminster last week laid the foundation-stone of a new museum and school of art for Chester—a building towards the erection of which the Duke contributed £4000 and gave a portion of the site, which stands out prominently on Grosvenor-road, leading from Chester to Eaton Hall. An interesting feature in connection with the ceremony was the conspicuous place assigned to nearly 2000 school-children, whom the trustees desired thus early to interest in the museum and art schools. There was a distinguished company present.

The steam-launch Queen Victoria, sent to Egypt by the National Society for Aid to the Sick and Wounded in War, to serve for conveying medical comforts up the Nile and bringing down invalids from Lord Wolseley's Army, was "christened" by Lady Baring, at Cairo, on the 10th ult., in presence of Sir Evelyn Baring, General Stephenson, and the medical staff. It is under the medical charge of Mr. E. F. White, of St. Thomas's Hospital, and is fully equipped for this special service. Assistant-Commissary-General J. S. Young acts as Special Commissioner for the National Society in Egypt.

The testatrix bequeaths to her said sister £9300 and an annuity of £500 and her residence, with the furniture, plate, books, and effects, for life. There are numerous legacies to relatives and others, and the residue of her real and personal estate she leaves, upon trust, for her grand-daughter, Maria de Carmo Ferreira; but if she enter religion or becomes a professed nun, the said bequest is to become void.

The will (dated June 21, 1882) of Mr. William Parker Hamond, J.P., D.L., late of Pampisford Hall, Cambridgeshire, who died on Nov. 12 last, was proved on the 14th ult. by the Rev. THE BRITISH CHESS ASSOCIATION.

The following is the constitution of the newly formed British Chess Association as adopted at the meeting of the members referred to in our issue of the 31st ult. The programme for the current year includes a play tournament in which four prizes will be given, value, respectively, twenty guineas, ten guineas, five guineas, and three guineas; and an international problem tournament for three prizes, value, respectively, ten guineas, five guineas, and three guineas. There will also be a tournament between the federated clubs for a silver cup, a problem solution tourney, blindfold play, and telegraphic matches between London and the chief towns of Great Britain and Ireland.

1. The British Chess Association is a federation of chess clubs, chess associations, and individual chessplayers in the British Empire.

2. The object of the B.C.A. is the promotion of the theory and practice of chess in all its branches.

3. The governing body of the B.C.A. shall consist of a president, three vice-presidents, a treasurer, secretary, and council of twenty-one members, in whom the property of the association shall be vested. One third of the council shall retire annually by rotation, but shall be eligible for re-election. In the first two years the retirement shall be in alphabetical order.

4. Membership of the B. C. A. may be attained by clubs and associations on payment of an annual subscription of 5s. for every twenty-five members and fraction of twenty-five members on its books. In the case of individuals, life-membership may be attained on payment of £3 3s., and annual membership on payment of 5s. annually; in all these cases with the approval of the council. Foreign players of distinction may be elected honorary members of the association at the discretion of the council.

5. The degree of M.B.C.A. (Chess-Master) shall be conferred on members of the association in recognition of their pre-eminent achievements as chessplayers. This honour to be conferred only by acclamation of the council.

6. That the degree of F.B.C.A. (Fellow) be awarded to members of the association for their proficiency in any branch of chess. This honour to be awarded by the votes of at least two thirds of the members of the council.

7. No member shall be eligible as M.B.C.A., or F.B.C.A., until after fourteen days' notice, posted by the secretary, to each member of the council of the name of the candidate. No member of the council proposed shall take part in or be present at the time of voting for his election. Members of council may vote in this instance by proxy.

8. No member shall be elected an F.B.C.A. on account of his merit as a chessplayer unless his proficiency is such that no master can successfully give him greater odds than a pawn and two moves. In other departments of chess distinction it shall be left to the discretion of the council.

9. Every club and association shall have the right to nominate one delegate for every twenty-five members (or fraction of twenty-five subscribed for) to represent it at the general meeting of the B. C. A., which shall be held at least once a year, in the month of January, and shall be convened by the council. Each such delegate shall have an equal vote with individual members on all questions before the general meeting, which shall include the election of the governing council, the arrangement as to time and place of the association meetings, the national and international tournaments and contests to be held under the direction of the B. C. A., and the prizes to be awarded thereat, and the settlement of the programme for the ensuing association meetings.

10. No resolution at such meetings shall be deemed to be carried unless it receives the votes of the majority of members actually present.

11. All subscriptions shall be payable in advance, and shall be due upon Jan. 1 of each year. And no member, whether a club or an individual, whose subscription is in arrear, shall be entitled to vote.

12. The Annual Chess Meeting of the association shall be held in every year alternately in London and in some large provincial town, and the first meeting shall take place in London, at a time to be appointed by the council.

13. No change in the constitution of the B. C. A. shall be made, except by a three-fourths majority of voters actually present at a general meeting, nor until after written notice of such proposed change shall have been given to the secretary of the B. C. A. at least one month previous to such meeting. On a requisition of forty members, the secretary shall summon the council, who shall thereupon convene a general meeting.

A match was played on the 4th instant at the Salutation Tavern between the fourth class of the City Club and the London and Westminster Bank Club, resulting in a victory for the latter, with a score of 7½ to 2½. A very creditable performance for the bankers.

The fourth and final match of the chess season at Melbourne, was played between the Victorian and Turn-Verein Chess Clubs, on Nov. 25 last. There were six competitors on each side, and the victory fell to the "Victorian" by six to four, with two drawn games. The Australasian of Melbourne notes that much excitement prevails in anticipation of the arrival of the British Champion, Mr. Blackburne, and predicts for him a cordial welcome.

In transcribing the following problem, we omitted to note the name of the author or the publication in which it appeared. Perhaps some of our readers will enable us to do justice to both:—

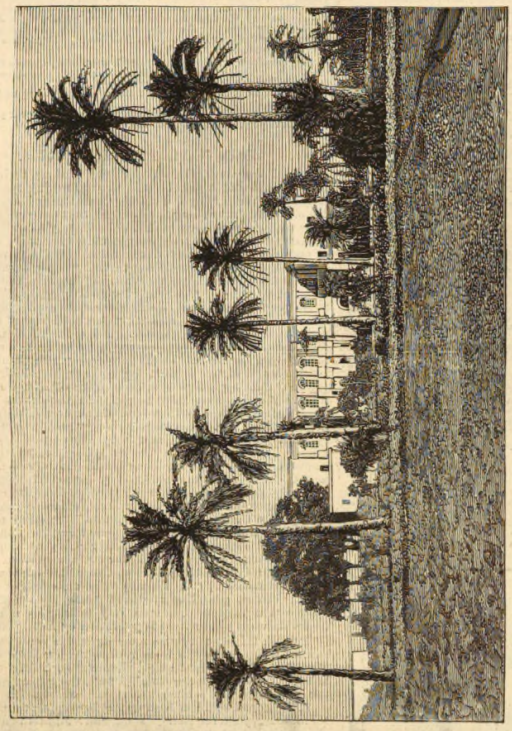
White: K at K 3rd, R at Q Kt 4th, B's at Q Kt sq and Q B sq. (Four pieces.)

Black: K at Q 8th, Pawns at Q Kt 4th and Q B 6th. (Four pieces.)

White to play, and mate in four moves.

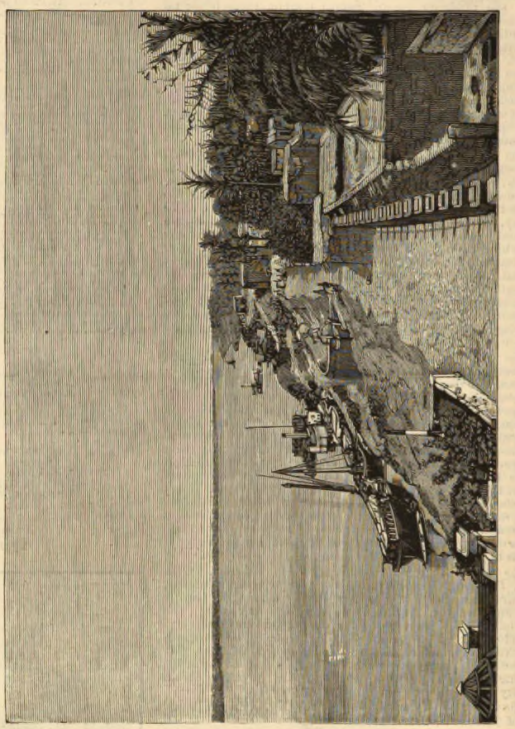
MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Messrs. Boosey and Co.'s recent publications include some pleasing songs that will be welcome in drawing-room circles. "Our Last Waltz," by J. L. Molloy, and "May Margaret," by Theo. Marzials are among the novelties that have been recently sung with great success at Mr. John Boosey's London Ballad Concerts. The first-named song is in flowing waltz time, and of specially vocal character, the other being also very melodious and agreeable in a different style. "Saturday night," by J. L. Molloy, is an expressive setting of some sentimental lines by E. F. Weatherly. "A Penny for Your Thoughts," by Cécile S. Hartog has much marked character, both in the lady's music and the lines by T. M. Watson, "Can it be true?" and "Do you think of me?" Two songs by F. L. Moir deserve favourable mention, each having a prominent and taking melody of a smooth and vocal character. "The Cumberland" is a very effective setting, by Charles Marshall, of some vigorous lines by Longfellow, descriptive of a naval engagement. The composer has reflected the sense of the verses in some energetic strains that lend themselves readily to vocal declamation. Mr. Louis Diehl's song, "Steady and Ready" is of a martial stamp, and very suggestive of military ardour. "Two Thoughts" is by Lady Arthur Hill, whose graceful compositions we have before had occasion to commend. The song now referred to is another example of her Ladyship's command of fluent melody of pleasing character; unpretentious, while yet being free from commonplace phrases. Mr. Molloy's song, "Our Last Waltz" (referred to above), has been transcribed for the pianoforte, in dance form, by George Lamothe, the marked rhythm of the original rendering it peculiarly suitable for such adaptation. Messrs. Boosey and Co. are the publishers, as of all the other pieces above mentioned. "A Lullaby" is an effective song by G. E. Prince, who has produced some good declamatory strains that may be rendered very telling by a singer of moderate vocal powers. It is published by Morley and Co.



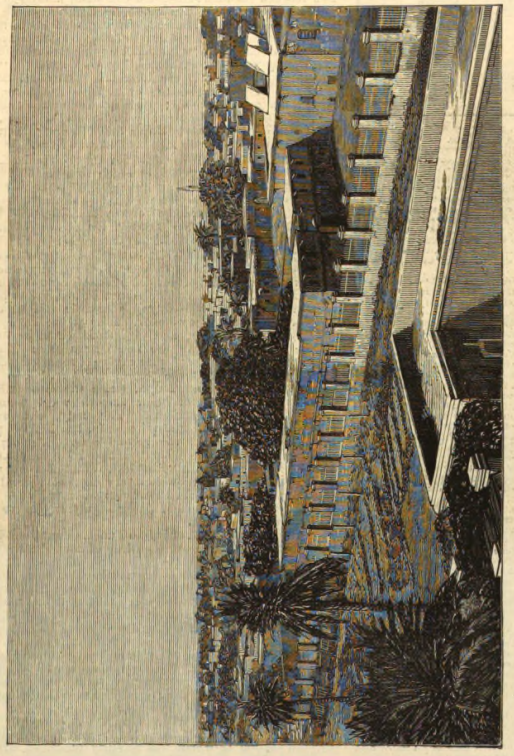
Mr. W. Czerny publishes some agreeable vocal and instrumental music. In the former class are: "Birds of Balmy Woodlands" ("Adieu, adieu, Bonheur"), a bright "Tyrolienne," with French and English text, the latter arranged by the publisher. The music bears the well-known name of J. B. Wekerlin, and is a good specimen of florid vocal writing. "Flowers Beyond the Stars," song, and "Mai tout en Fleurs," chansonette, both by E. Marlois, have each a distinctive character, the first in accordance with the sentiment of the English text, the other having much of the light piquancy of the French style. "Loving for Ever," by G. Money, is a good specimen of the sentimental ballad, with an effective change from common-time to waltz rhythm. Mr. Czerny's collection of "Ladies' Choruses," in fourpenny numbers, has now reached its fifth series, and comprises a large number of pieces of part-music, for three and four voices, by ancient and modern composers, forming an inexpensive but intrinsically valuable collection. Mr. Czerny's issue of instrumental music comprises a charming "Canzona" by the late Joachim Raff; a sprightly "Valse des Abeilles," by O. Wagner"; "Viola" (worthily entitled "Danse Gracieuse"), by M. Schröter; "Repose," a pleasing sketch by B. Tours (for piano, solo or with violin or violoncello); fragments from Bach's celebrated "Chaconne," easily arranged by D. Brocca for piano, solo or with violin; and Czerny's Major and Minor Scales in double notes; excellent practice for pianoforte students.

"The Shadowed Home" ("Via Crucis Via Lucis") is a song of a serious character, in which some earnest lines by Mary Mark Lemon are set to appropriate strains by Mr. Suchet Champion. The solemn tone of the music is well relieved by occasional changes of rhythm. Mr. J. Williams is the publisher. "London Town" is a pleasingly melodious song by Mr. Watson, published by Mr. B. Williams.



In "Prospice," lines by Browning have found a congenial musical setting at the hands of Mr. C. V. Stanford, who has earned celebrity by many important compositions for the church, the chamber, and the stage. The song now referred to has much strongly marked individuality of character and affords good scope for a declamatory singer. It is published by Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co., from whom we have also "Love that hath us in the net," lines from Tennyson's "The Miller's Daughter," pleasingly set to melodious strains by E. Hatzfeld. "At the feet of my love," and "Arise, Belov'd," both by Kate Ralph, (from the same publishers), may be commended for their smooth vocal melody and appropriate accompaniments. The lady composer, who is a pianist of sterling acquirements, has herself provided the pleasing lines of the second song. Among various settings of Tennyson's songs published by Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co., is "Ring out, Wild Bells," the music by M. Gounod, who has produced a very expressive vocal piece—the reiterated phrases in the accompaniment, with the frequent use of a pedal bass, being highly suggestive of the sentiment of the words.

"The National Book of Hymn Tunes, Chants, and Kyries," edited by W. A. Jefferson, is an important volume published by Messrs. Patey and Willis. The first purpose of the work was to provide a supplement to existing hymnaries and chant books, consisting of new and original compositions by living British composers; but the large amount of material offered to the editor led to a great extension of the original design, and the book accordingly forms a complete collection, available for independent use by choirs and congregations. Among the many contributors to the volume are the musical professors of the four Universities. The contents are excellently arranged for ready and facile use, copious and various indices being important features. The work is well engraved and printed, and published at a comparatively small cost.



From Messrs. W. J. Willcocks and Co. we receive "Menuet de Manon"—an extract from M. Massenet's new opera, the English version of which was recently produced, with great success, at Liverpool, by Mr. Carl Rosa, who intends giving it during his approaching season at Drury-Lane Theatre. The piece of dance music now referred to has much delicate grace, with a touch of the antique style belonging to the form indicated. It is published both as a pianoforte solo, and for two performers.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: A BIVOUAC IN THE DESERT.

THE MAGAZINES FOR FEBRUARY.

The Cornhill concludes "The Talk of the Town" in the only way which the story admitted, although William Henry's repentance is, we fear, apocryphal. In other respects, the tale has strictly followed the course of history: so curious that those who do not know Mr. Payn's strict fidelity have probably condemned his plot as unnatural. "Rainbow Gold" maintains its character as a clever and powerful but hard and mechanical story. Mr. Grant Allen describes the natural history of the banana, and alarms us with a prophecy of the extinction of the potato, whose originally fine constitution, it seems, is sadly impaired. "The Daisycliffe Mystery" is one of those amusing tales of successful roguery, not too heinous for a laugh, of which this magazine has produced so many.

Mr. Morley has scarcely done George Eliot or himself justice by his essay upon her correspondence in Macmillan's Magazine. The appreciation is pitched many notes too low, and most of the criticism, though well expressed, is of an obvious and commonplace character. The fact is, we believe, that the book is not one to be reviewed in a hurry. It must be absorbed quietly, ruminated patiently, and is the very last to be intrusted to a busy man, however able, distracted by the whirl of politics. Mr. Morley is seen to much greater advantage in his review of the month. Scepticism and pessimism, usually dull and depressing, are with him pungent and vivacious. Timid counsels were never advocated with so much courage. Lord Tennyson's "Becket" is not a work over which the reviewer need spend much time, and it receives thorough justice in a very able anonymous criticism. Mr. Lecky's melodious and finely felt verses, "On an Old Song," make us wish for more of his minstrelsy. Mr. F. Pollock writes like a true patriot in his narrative of his visit to Canada; and "Village Life in South Africa" is eminently graphic and picturesque.

"Shakspeare's County," by Miss Rose Kingsley, and "Naworth Castle," by Professor Creighton, are excellent specimens of the topographical papers familiar to the readers of the English Illustrated Magazine. The illustrations are admirable, as also are the little gems from the old masters of engraving scattered throughout the number. "In an Italian Taverna," by Charles Grant, is a pretty and affecting story; and Mr. Wilkie Collins's "Girl at the Gate," concluded in this number, is nearer his old style than anything he has written for years. Nor is Mr. Hugh Conway's "Family Affair" devoid of merit, although it has not the sensational character of his first attempts in fiction.

"The Search Party's Find," by J. Arbuthnot Wilson, in Longmans' Magazine, is a powerful story; and "An Incident of Empire" is a striking narrative. Mr. Brander Matthews's paper on "The Antiquity of Jests" contains excellent remarks on this subject, enlivened by appropriate examples.

Blackwood, which always honours its past contributors on fitting occasions, opens with a regular official article on George Eliot. Everything which is fitting to say was said: yet there seems a want of the warmth which marked the more spontaneous tribute paid on occasion of her decease. The best portions of the article are the references to Mr. Lewes. "The Waters of Hercules," lively as ever, has reached a crisis. "Plain Frances Mowbray," on the other hand, the plot of which is laid at Venice, promises to be a quiet, though by no means an uninteresting story. The most remarkable of the other contributions are Lady Martin's observations on the character of Beatrice, in a letter to Mr. Ruskin, and a lugubrious chronicle of "A Black Year for Investors," dwelling on the national loss occasioned by the depreciation of securities on the Stock Exchange. From the appended analysis, however, it would appear that more than a third of the total loss has been incurred in American bonds and shares, which may not improbably admit of recovery.

The Nineteenth Century is varied, but heavy. The important problems of Imperial federation and the reform of the House of Lords are advanced, though not solved, by Mr. Forster and Lord Pembroke. Mr. Matthew Arnold praises the Americans for knowing their own minds, and contrasts their directness in politics with the confusion and inconsistency of English political parties. M. Vambéry decides that Russia is not likely to conquer India until her Tartar subjects are thoroughly Russianised—an operation which may require generations. In the meantime, India might be made thoroughly secure by a combination of the foreign policy of Lord Lytton and the internal policy of Lord Ripon. Colonel Moncrieff pleads the cause of irrigation in Egypt; Mr. Archer instructs dramatic critics in their duties; and Mr. Henry George and Mr. Hyndman discuss quite cheerfully and amicably the question whether landed property only should be stolen from its present possessors for the good of the nation, as Mr. George thinks; or funded and commercial property also, as Mr. Hyndman would prefer.

The Fortnightly Review is not very interesting. Mr. F. Harrison's Positivist review of the year is noticeable for its unqualified surrender of all the features of Comte's Positivism which were distasteful to Stuart Mill. Three papers of conjectures on the probable "ideas of the new voters" are one-sided, but suggestive nevertheless. Mr. Kebbel gets the most possible out of the meagre domestic records of Jane Austen. Mr. Irving's sketch of "the American audience" is undesignedly amusing. "I understand," he says, "that when they do not like a performance they go away." It is, of course, inconceivable that Mr. Irving should have had any personal experience of this Transatlantic peculiarity.

Mr. Justin M'Carthy's indictment of "Dublin Castle," in the Contemporary Review, is open to the usual complaint against Irish Nationalist writings, that they are eloquent in the denunciation of evils, but vague in the suggestion of remedies. Mr. M'Carthy does not tell us how, in the event of the abolition of the Castle, the lives and properties of unpopular persons are to be protected, nor does he even say that they can be protected, except by the system he condemns. Mr. F. Myers reports the result of his experiments in automatic writing to be the identification of "Planchette" with unconscious cerebration, and seems to make out a good case. The Hon. Roden Noel contributes a thoughtful critique on Tennyson, and M. Sardou's "Theodora" is ably analysed by Professor Bryce.

Sir C. G. Duffy's appeal, in the National Review, to the Conservative party to take up the idea of Home Rule in a moderate form will be received with the respect due to the eminence of the writer. But, like Mr. M'Carthy's article in the Contemporary, it offers no guarantee for the safety of the course recommended. Sir Charles must prove the existence of the moderate Irish party on which he relies, but of which, in the present condition of Irish politics, it is difficult to discover any trace. Mr. Armstrong's paper on Gainsborough, and Mr. Baden-Powell's on Imperial federation, are the only other contributions of much interest.

The Century commences a new novel by Henry James, "The Bostonians," showing no falling off in his peculiar talent, but as yet failing to create a powerful interest either in its personages or its situations. "A Florentine Mosaic" is a clever text accompanying very clever sketches; but the main attraction of the number is General Grant's account of the battle of Shiloh, supplemented by independent narratives from Confederate sources. The conflict of testimony is extraordinary: it will, to all appearance, never be settled whether General Grant was, or was not, within an ace of destruction, and whether General Beauregard did or did not throw away a victory already won. Harper is full of entertaining illustrated papers, the best being those on Hatfield House, and "The New and Old in Yucatan." The paper on the Lick Observatory gives a very interesting account of the most remarkable institution of this description in the world. "At the Red Glove" is an excellent story; and the description of the great social experiment at the works of the Pullman Car Company is full of interest. The Atlantic Monthly has the conclusion of Miss O'Meara's reminiscences of Madame Mohl's salon, and an excellent notice of Vernon Lee's writings by Miss H. W. Preston.

The serial novels in Temple Bar are continued with spirit, and there is abundance of entertaining anecdote in Mr. Serjeant Ballantine's "Recollections of Law and Lawyers." The reminiscences of George Eliot are utterly barren of incident, but convey a pleasing impression.

The Gentleman's Magazine has two good stories, the continuation of Miss O'Hanlon's "The Unforeseen," and Mr. Theodore Bent's "Romance of a Great Statue," which seems founded on the discovery of the Venus of Milo. There are several miscellaneous papers of interest, among which Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's disquisition on Shakspeare folios and quartos deserves especial notice. Julian Hawthorne's "Miss Cadogna" is completed in Belgravia, and Mr. Russell's "Strange Voyage" and Cecil Power's "Babylon" are continued with abundance of spirit. The latter is one of the most amusing of current serial tales, but the cleverness displayed is rather that of the satirist than that of the novelist.

Time, which is immensely improved under its new management, contains an admirable paper by Miss A. M. F. Robinson, giving a most interesting account of the mysticism of the religious orders in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and especially of the representatives of earlier and later Beguinism, the nuns Mechtilde and Katryn. Mr. Bowie's narrative of Mr. Fawcett's work at the Post Office, Miss Betham-Edwards's "Rebuke amid Roses," and the review of "Miss Brown," are also contributions of a high class.

The Magazine of Art contains the usual variety of readable articles and interesting illustrations, among them being Raphael's "Madonna Ansidei," the great picture which it is proposed to buy from the Duke of Marlborough for the National Gallery. The Art Journal for this month is full of interest as regards the subjects treated, but the illustrations are most of them extremely poor. Orchardson's picture of "Napoleon on board the Bellerophon" has had all the life polished out of it in the process of making a steel engraving; and Mrs. Alfred Hunt's interesting account of Whitby is badly illustrated with some flat and spiritless views, apparently from photographs. Mr. J. S. Hodson's account of modern processes of automatic engraving promises to be of interest to the technical reader.

The Theatre has good photographs of Miss Jessie Bond as the Charity Girl in "The Sorcerer," and of Messrs. Hill and Penley in the "Private Secretary"; and among its varied and pleasant contents are—a critical study of "Beckett," the foyers of the minor theatres in Paris, Mr. Irving's second American tour, and much information under the headings Our Musical Box, Our Play Box, and Our Omnibus Box.

The principal serials of the enterprising firm of Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co., besides The Magazine of Art, noticed above, are—Cassell's Magazine, The Quiver, Cassell's Saturday Journal, Greater London, Royal Shakspere, Familiar Wild Flowers, Book of Health, Old and New London, Illustrated Universal History, Popular Gardening, Picturesque Europe, Picturesque America, the Life and Words of Christ, by the Rev. Cunningham Geikie; Little Folks' Magazine, Cassell's Popular Educator, and the first part of Our Own Country.

Among Fashion Books received are—Le Follet, The Season, Ladies' Treasury, Ladies' Gazette of Fashion, World of Fashion, Moniteur de la Mode, and Myra's Journal of Dress and Fashion.

We have also to acknowledge London Society, The Argosy, the Month, Good Words, the Army and Navy Magazine, Household Words, St. Nicholas, the Red Dragon, Eastward Ho! the Antiquarian, Chambers's Journal, All the Year Round, Merry England, Irish Monthly, Leisure Hour, Book Lore, United Service Magazine, Fores's Sporting Notes and Sketches, Harper's Young People, the Illustrated Science Monthly, Technical Journal, Baptist Magazine, Aunt Judy's Magazine, and the Rosebud.

There was a quiet wedding last Saturday morning at St. Peter's, Cranley-gardens, Mr. R. Seymour Stewart, son of the late Mr. and Lady Helen Stewart, being married to the only daughter of Colonel O'Hanlon, late of the Bengal Cavalry. The bride, who was not attended by any bridesmaids, was given away by Field-Marshal Sir Patrick Grant.

The returns of emigration from the United Kingdom during the last month show that 8434 emigrants of British origin left our shores in January, 1885, the number in January, 1884, having been 10,409. The emigrants to Australasia numbered 2752, those in January, 1884, having been 4466. To British North America the numbers were 233, as against 512 last year. As was the case in January, 1884, the English were the most numerous, being 6193, the Irish being 1363, and the Scotch 878.

"It is only through woe that we are taught to reflect, and gather the Honey of Wisdom not from flowers but THORNS."—Lord Lytton.

EVERY YEAR a great battle is fought in our midst (almost without a protest), in which twenty thousand are slain and a hundred thousand wounded from Scarlet Fever ALONE. True, but horrible. Can this fearful slaughter and sick-list not be prevented? Yes! Pass it by if you like, but it is true. Who's to blame? Read a large illustrated sheet given with each Bottle of ENO'S FRUIT SALT. The information is invaluable. Eno's Fruit Salt keeps the blood pure and prevents disease and premature death by natural means.

POMONA BRINGING THE FRUITS OF THE EARTH TO HYGEIA.

"MODERATION IS THE SILKEN STRING RUNNING THROUGH THE PEARL CHAIN OF ALL VIRTUES."—Bishop Hall.

DRAWING AN OVERDRAFT ON THE BANK OF LIFE.—Late hours, fagged, unnatural excitement, breathing impure air, too rich food, alcoholic drink, gouty, rheumatic and other blood poisons, feverish colds, biliousness, sick headache, skin eruptions, pimples on the face, want of appetite, sourness of stomach, &c.—Use ENO'S FRUIT SALT. It is pleasant, cooling, health-giving, refreshing, and invigorating. You cannot overstate its great value in keeping the blood pure and free from disease.

IMPORTANT TO TRAVELLERS AND ALL LEAVING HOME FOR A CHANGE.

"Winchester, July 13, 1884.—Sir,—I write to tell you what your FRUIT SALT has done for me. During the Zulu War, Consul O'Neill and myself had occasion to survey the Maputa River. We had great difficulties in stowing sufficient fresh water for our need, and were obliged on our return to drink the river water—water you may call it, but I call it liquid mud; mud banks both sides, a tropical sun all day, and a miasmatic dew all night. We had the good fortune, however, to have with us a couple of bottles of your invaluable FRUIT SALT, and never took the "water" without a judicious admixture of it, and so did not suffer from the abominable concoction. Now, when we arrived at Lorenzo Marquay, there was no more FRUIT SALT to be obtained. I was sent on to Durban, but poor Mr. O'Neill was on the flat of his back with ague. At Durban I could only get one bottle, as every one was sold out, it being so much in demand. When I mention that we only went in a small boat with four niggers, and that two expeditions from men-of-war, with fully-equipped boats, had tried the survey before, and only got forty miles (having lost the greater part of their crews through the malaria), while we got over eighty miles, I think I am only doing justice in putting our success down to your excellent preparation.—I am Sir, yours faithfully, A LIEUTENANT, R.N., F.R.G.S.—To J. C. Eno, Esq., Hatcham, London, S.E."

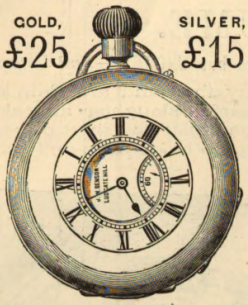
PERSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER.—One of her Majesty's Consuls writes from Teheran:—"It may interest you to know that while riding from Teheran to Meshed not long ago, being one day rather unwell, to my astonishment and delight the Persian courier who accompanied me produced a bottle of what he called Numuki meeveh, which was no less in fact translated than ENO'S FRUIT SALT. The man told me that he now never travelled without a bottle.—Yours faithfully, SHEIKH JAM, December, 1884.—To J. C. Eno, Esq."

EGYPT.—CAIRO.—"Since my arrival in Egypt, in August last, I have on three separate occasions been attacked by fever, from which on the first occasion I lay in hospital for six weeks. The last two attacks have been, however, completely repulsed in a remarkably short space of time by the use of your valuable FRUIT SALT, to which I owe my present health, at the very least, if not my life itself. Heartfelt gratitude for my restoration to health and preservation impels me to add my testimony to the already overwhelming store of the same, and in so doing I feel that I am but obeying the dictates of duty.—Believe me to be, Sir, gratefully yours, A CORPORAL, 19th Hussars, May 26, 1883.—Mr. J. C. Eno."

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.—"A new invention is brought before the public and commands success. A score of abominable imitations are immediately introduced by the unscrupulous, who, in copying the original closely enough to deceive the public, and yet not so exactly as to infringe upon legal rights, exercise an ingenuity that, employed in an original channel, could not fail to secure reputation and profit."—ADAMS.

IMPORTANT TO TRAVELLERS.—"We, the undersigned, have for the last four years used your FRUIT SALT during several important Survey Expeditions in the Malay Peninsula, Siam, and Cambodia, and have undoubtedly derived very great benefit from it. In one instance only was one of our party attacked with fever during that period, and that happened after our supply of FRUIT SALT had run out. When making long marches under the powerful rays of a vertical sun, or travelling through swampy districts, the undersigned have used the FRUIT SALT two and three times a day in the following manner and proportions:—At daybreak, two teaspoonfuls mixed with the juice of a raw lime, and a little sugar, in a tumbler of water, shortly afterwards a light meal of tea or coffee, bread and fruit; about mid-day, one small spoonful with raw lime-juice and water; and before retiring for the night, another teaspoonful in water. The FRUIT SALT used as aforesaid acts as a gentle aperient, keeps the blood cool and healthy, and wards off fever. The undersigned have pleasure in voluntarily testifying to the value of your preparation, and our firm belief in its efficacy. We never go in the jungle without it, and have also recommended it to others.—Yours truly, Commander A. J. LOFTUS, F.R.G.S., his Siamese Majesty's Hydrographer; E. C. DAVIDSON, Superintendent Siamese Government Telegraphs.—Bangkok, Siam, May, 1883.—J. C. Eno, Esq., London."

A SOUTH AFRICAN PROFESSIONAL MASON DIVER'S EXPERIENCE of the BEST METHOD of PRESERVING HEALTH under TRYING CONDITIONS:—"Having for many years suffered from biliousness and sick headache, without obtaining any relief, I was recommended to take ENO'S FRUIT SALT, which I did, and after a few doses found great relief. From that time (five years since) I have never been without a bottle of your invaluable FRUIT SALT. Being a professional Mason Diver, I was sent from Cape Town to the Orange River Bridge by the Government Engineer, to prepare the foundations of piers, &c. In the hurry I forgot my bottle of FRUIT SALT, and had not been many days before my old complaint began to trouble me. It was a week before I succeeded in procuring a bottle of ENO'S FRUIT SALT, and in that time I suffered very much, but after taking it I perfectly recovered. If I feel ever so bad from the effects of a long stay under water, a moderate dose puts me all right, and I am fit for work at any moment. I think I am only doing justice in putting the success of my staying powers down to your invaluable FRUIT SALT.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully, WILLIAM LEA, Colonial Government Mason Diver, Orange River Bridge, Cape Colony, Dec. 26, 1884."—To Mr. J. C. Eno, Hatcham, London, S.E.



CAUTION.—Examine each Bottle, and see that the Capsule is marked "ENO'S FRUIT SALT." Without it, you have been imposed on by a worthless imitation. Sold by all Chemists. Directions in Sixteen Languages How to Prevent Disease.

PREPARED ONLY AT ENO'S FRUIT SALT WORKS, HATCHAM, LONDON, S.E., BY J. C. ENO'S PATENT.

THE "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.

"Le Follet" says:—The Louis Velveteen has already rejoiced in a longer reign in the world of fashion than that of any material within our recollection; and when we take into consideration that it is equally suitable for all occasions—an advantage no other fabric possesses—and that, whether employed as a complete dress, portions of toilettes, or trimmings, it is as effective as it is serviceable, its favour is not surprising.

The Louis Velveteen, from its wonderful resemblance to the richest Silk Velvet, is essentially a lady's material; the lights and shadows so thoroughly like those of Genoa and Lyons Velvet, the rich folds and graceful drapery, so soft and silky to the touch, all accounting easily for its great and permanent vogue among the aristocracy, both here and abroad.

Though very strong, it is so light in wear that even in elaborately made dresses, with long trains, it has no inconvenient weight; while from some peculiar and special arrangement of the pile, no amount of creasing will flatten or rub it; neither rain nor dust alter its rich colourings or dim the silky bloom for which it is so celebrated—advantages that cannot be too highly appreciated.

EVERY YARD OF THE GENUINE BEARS THE NAME "LOUIS."
THE WEAR OF EVERY YARD GUARANTEED.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: KHARTOUM, FROM A SKETCH BY LIEUTENANT-COLONEL J. A. GRANT, F.R.S., TAKEN IN APRIL, 1863.
The steam-boat is introduced to show the spot from which Sir Charles Wilson reconnoitred the town.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

The Government were saved from being harassed by one vexed question at the resumption of the Session by the sound judgment of Mr. Arthur Peel. It was only natural that the criminal attempts to blow up the House of Commons and Westminster Hall by dynamite should be followed by the institution of stringent rules for regulating the admission of the public to hear the debates. Members of both Houses will, no doubt, exercise due caution in the issue of orders, and also in their personal introductions. Now the objectionable restrictions which would greatly and needlessly have impeded the members of the Press in the discharge of their duties in the inner Lobby and in the Galleries have been gracefully withdrawn, it is not necessary to dwell upon the manifest impropriety there would have been in putting a serviceable body of gentlemen to signal inconvenience. On the contrary, the Speaker of the House of Commons has increased the high estimation in which he was held by his frank and courteous withdrawal of the unduly severe rules in regard to the Press.

To read what is written about "Carmen Sylva" and other Royal personages who make literature, it would seem as if sovereigns and the consorts of sovereigns did something extraordinary, and showed a certain condescension by becoming authors. Can it be forgotten that King David and King Solomon wrote such poetry as even "Carmen Sylva," Queen—not of Sheba, but—of Roumania, could no more equal than she could fly? Are the works of Marcus Aurelius, Roman Emperor and "philosopher," of the Princess Anna Comnena, of Alfred the Great, of French Charles the Ninth, who wrote about hunting, of "Marguerite des Marguerites," and all the rest of them, blotted out of remembrance? Why, Royal authors, poets and poetesses, swarm; and common authors, if it so please them, may reflect that Royal brethren of their craft date from remote antiquity, and that, so far, there is a sort of lineage to be traced between King Solomon and "the poet Close."

The question as to "who shot the dog" has been set at rest: it was not a Volunteer, but a farm-bailiff (who, by-the-way, may be a Volunteer) at Sevenoaks, and the dog he shot was "a young pedigree bull-dog." The farm-bailiff, being sued in the County Court, pleaded that the dog in life showed symptoms of hydrophobia, but a veterinary surgeon deposed that the dog after death and dissection showed no such symptoms, and the farm-bailiff had to pay five guineas, "with costs." It is a pity that dogs cannot be made to carry a written character about with them, for it is very difficult sometimes to distinguish between what is hydrophobia and what is "all fun" on the part of an eccentric dog. The case, however, is so far satisfactory in that it establishes the value of "a young pedigree bull-dog" according to the Cocker of the Sevenoaks County Court: five pounds five shillings.

"De mortuis nil nisi bonum" is an excellent precept; but if all that has been written about the Hamburg firm of "South Sea Kings" must be accepted, there appears to be very little "bonum" indeed to be said of the lately deceased Herr Godeffroy, the founder of the "concern." He was probably a pattern of every virtue in his domestic circle; but, unfortunately, all we are told has to do with his principles of business, and they seem to have been quite shocking, if at least he is to be held responsible for the administration of his "kingdom," and if to him is to be applied the maxim, "Qui facit per alium, facit per se." Still, even the Godeffroys, whose kingdom, by-the-way, has fallen, if they did decree that "no article was" to be "sold for less than one hundred per cent on its prime cost," gave the people they employed a personal interest in the traffic, and tried their hardest to oust the sponge-like "middleman." Howbeit, the "middleman," if not too receptively sponge-like, is a very useful person, and no doubt holds the same debatable views as another about the necessity of living.

Hardly has one season's pantomime reached the zenith of its popularity before arrangements must be made for the following year. Such gigantic dimensions have scenery and effects now reached, that it takes nearly twelve months to model and carry out all the masks, armour, and grotesques, design and make the dresses, paint the canvas, and arrange the company. Already has Mr. Augustus Harris, of Drury-Lane Theatre, settled that "Aladdin" is to be the subject of his annual for 1885-6; and he has entered into engagements with those favourites of children Messrs. Nicholls and Campbell, Mr. Charles Lauri, the Misses Mario, and report says that he has persuaded the eminent burlesque actress, Miss Nellie Farren, to abandon the Gaiety, where she has been for nearly ten years, in favour of the National playhouse. To provide three hours of stage entertainment takes months of energy and thought, and occupies the attention of hundreds of people.

The change which has been announced for this year in the value and distribution of Queen's Plates, has been the death-blow of flat-racing at Ipswich. So far as sport goes, there is no reason perhaps for regret; but from the sentimental point of view it is lamentable to see poor Ipswich deprived for ever of the Royal Plate which had been its mainstay, yearly or every other year, from 1727. But the time is past when lords and gentlemen would send their horses away from home to run for one hundred guineas, and would have sent them to the antipodes for three hundred; and, on the other hand, it would seem that, even at the best of times, neither the Duke of Ancaster, nor Lord Gower, nor Mr. W. Crofts, nor anybody else, could make horse-racing, any more than Cardinal Wolsey could make his college, a flourishing institution at Ipswich. No doubt it is too near Newmarket and Cambridge.

If history repeats itself, so does petty literary or phemistic criticism. The old controversy appears to have arisen again about "a" or "an" before an "h." Once upon a time, it seemed to have been settled that the article was originally "one," and that the question was whether to talk about "a" or "an" was not to put the cart before the horse, the "a" having been used because of the difficulty in pronouncing "an" (which had superseded "one") before consonants. The correct thing would seem, therefore, to be that you should use "an" whenever it can be used without inconvenience. It would be distressing to pronounce distinctly "an parallelogram"; but it is generally easy to pronounce "an" before the aspirate without much or any modification. In the sixty-eighth Psalm ("Prayer Book") and elsewhere, we find "an" before "horse," in the words "magnify Him that rideth upon the heavens as it were upon an horse"; and surely nobody would argue that the reader was intended to say "orse" or "oss," like a stableman. It does not follow, therefore, that, when "an" is written or pronounced before the aspirate, the aspirate is necessarily to be ignored altogether.

Amongst other depressing effects, the departure of the Guards for Egypt will prove disastrous to the London tradesmen. A season that promised to be bright and profitable now looks dull and gloomy, for in all the choice spirits of society there are none more sought after than the young Guardsmen, none more popular at balls and entertainments, none so free with their money, and none so generally jovial. Nor is it absolutely necessary that the fortune of war should take them away, for should her Majesty so desire, the Household Brigade need not be called out. With regard to ordinary regiments of cavalry and infantry, they are under the orders of the War Office absolutely, but it is the prerogative of the Queen to deal autocratically if she please with the Guards. As a rule, they do not expect, except in cases of absolute urgency, to be called away from England, though of late they have done good service in the East, and useful work in Ireland. No movements or changes of stations of the Household Brigade can be made without the express authority of the Court, and it is invariably asked for, on this occasion pressed for. Indeed, it is currently reported that her Majesty was very loth to give her consent to their employment, but she yielded to the personal persuasion of the Marquis of Hartington. Society will naturally be excited and anxious during the season, for most of the noblest families in the realm have a relative or two in the Guards.

The extra vigilance properly practised by the detectives who now swarm round about the public buildings occasions some rather curious occurrences. One day this week a gentleman was entering the Law Courts, and carrying in his hand what appeared to the official to be a suspicious-looking black bag, was courteously requested to allow its contents to be inspected. Laughingly, the bearer of the parcel assented. But it contained nothing more dangerous than some clean muslin bands and a packet of sandwiches, while the supposed dynamiter proved to be one of her Majesty's Judges, learned in the law. Although it would be convenient if the police officers were better acquainted with the personality of the frequenters of the buildings they guard, yet it must be admitted that a dozen mistakes like this are preferable to one blunder in the opposite direction. Rather search the pockets of the Lord Chancellor and all the Queen's Counsel than pass one ounce of nitro-glycerine.

While it is gratifying to note the progress towards recovery made by our wounded officers and men in the Soudan, it is still more satisfactory to us, and a great compliment to our medical schools, to find how competent the regimental doctors are to deal with battle-inflicted injuries. For the past thirty years—since the Crimea—English doctors have, happily, had little or no experience of bullet-wounds, and there must be many qualified surgeons in the Army who have never even seen a sabre cut or a spear thrust. Yet, when the time comes, they are skilful enough to deal with the sufferers as successfully as their German or French professional brethren, who were engaged in recent sanguinary European wars. This fact speaks volumes in favour of the hospital training, lectures, and general plan of education adopted by the authorities in England. Let us hope that, after the termination of the Egyptian Campaign, Army doctors may have another thirty years of study from books and hearsay only.

Soon the picture season will commence, and private views will be preceded by private receptions at their studios by popular artists. Amongst some of the interesting exhibits, will be Mr. Millais' large subject picture, painted to order for Sir Michael Bass, the Chevalier Desanges' portrait of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, in Masonic garb, and Mr. Joseph Clark's domestic groups of pretty children. It is not likely that Meissonier will show in England this season, though he has just completed two interesting studies. One, a grey sombre view of the banks of the Seine, near Poissy, with the figure of a solitary horseman; and the other, a family picture of a group of people playing ball. Every detail is depicted in this great French master's most minute style. Mr. Frith's contribution to Burlington House is an historical subject—"The Termination of John Knox's Interview with Mary Queen of Scots." The chief portrait there will be that of Lord Dufferin, by Mr. Frank Holl; while the popular President of the Royal Academy will, for a change, exhibit a huge piece of statuary. Mr. Luke Fildes has nearly completed a large work dealing with outdoor Venetian life. Mr. Vicat Cole has devoted himself to the portraiture of Father Thames; Mr. Herbert Schmalz is the exponent of Elaine, an idyll ever attractive to the artistic mind; Mr. Briton Rivière has expended a vast amount of time and pains on a picture entitled "The Sheep-Stealer"; and Mr. Marcus Stone has a new treatment of "The Gambler's Wife," with Gadshill, the country house of Charles Dickens, as a background.

M. David D'Angers, the son of the celebrated sculptor, has presented all his father's original medallions to the Louvre. This is a gift worth having.

The intimate associates of men of genius shine sometimes with a reflected glory, and we are glad to see that a biography will be shortly published of Thomas Poole, of Nether Stowey. He was a self-taught man, with fine qualities both of head and heart, and a keen appreciation of literary excellence, and at the close of the last century drew round him in his Somersetshire home the young poets who were destined to make a revolution in the art. With Poole, Coleridge formed, as Mr. Traill has lately told us, "one of the longest and closest friendships of his life." In a cottage belonging to Poole he prepared, in 1797, an edition of his poems, and the same year witnessed his memorable acquaintance with Wordsworth. In the same month of the same year, Charles and Mary Lamb appeared at the cottage, and of Elia, as well as of the two great poets, and their illustrious friend Southey, Poole was the genial host and intimate associate. It is said that a large number of letters, hitherto unpublished, will appear in the biography, and thus we are likely to have a fresh picture of a most interesting period of literary history.

"Better late than never" may have been the remark, perhaps, that occurred to Mr. William Fenwick when, according to report, he was "removed from Chester-le-Street Workhouse by a Sunderland solicitor" to clutch an inheritance of "£175,000, besides landed estates at Benwell, Holmside, and other places." Seventy-eight years of age, though, is rather late in the day; and that is said to be Mr. Fenwick's. If he be a descendant of the Mr. Fenwick, of Bywell, Northumberland, owner of the famous race-horse and sire, Match 'em, he would, were he a younger man, be very likely to patronise the Turf; and, even as things are, it may not be amiss to mention the case of the once well-known Mr. Jemmy Golding, of Helmsley Moors, who, when he was "rising" ninety-two, remarked to Mr. John Scott, the celebrated "Wizard" of Whitewall, quite casually: "There are no hunters bred nowadays, Mr. Scott; I 'll just away and buy some broodmares and breed a few."

The late M. Du Sommerard, director of the Hôtel Cluny, Paris, may be said to have met his death in the cause of his beloved museum. A few weeks ago he received a letter from a lady requesting an audience, and as he recognised the writing as that of a distinguished woman no longer young, he at once called on her. She received him in a superb salon filled with precious objets d' art, and took him through several rooms which were so completely occupied with similar treasures that even every inch of space under the beds was crowded. She told M. Du Sommerard that she and her late husband had made the collection, and as he was dead and had no relatives, and she had none of her own to leave it to, she wished to bequeath it to the Hôtel Cluny; adding that there was a similar collection at her country château, which was to be included, and invited him to go and inspect it. Of course he did so, and a catalogue was prepared, and also the outline of a legal document, giving all these valuables to the Cluny Museum. It was on leaving the notary's office after signing the deed which made over to the State a most valuable collection of works of art, that M. Du Sommerard caught the chill that in a few days brought him to the grave.

It is thought that the opening of the Antwerp Exposition Universelle, which was to have been at the beginning of May, will have to be postponed, on account of the number of demands for space that have recently come in. The building, in its original dimensions, was finished by Jan. 1, but it will have to be enlarged by about twenty thousand square yards. Belgian exhibits occupy the largest amount of space; France comes next; Germany has 6500 square yards, Russia 2000, Italy 4000, England 3600, and other countries have only asked for very small allotments. In all English exhibitions space is granted free, but as the promoters of the Antwerp scheme ask high prices, both for floor and partitions, they will probably make a great commercial success of their undertaking.

A magnificent ball was given last week by the King and Queen of Italy at the Quirinal. All accounts agree in declaring that Queen Marguerite looked charming, and that her dress was magnificent, but they differ as to its colour. No one knows what to call this particular nuance, and Dame Fashion herself has not yet named it; so one says that the tint was mastic, another styles it raisin de Corinthe, and a third Ophelia. This last is decidedly the prettiest appellation.

France evidently desires to claim all the prominent Arabs of the day, and has just discovered that Osman Digna is in reality one of her sons. He was born in 1832 at Rouen, and his real name is Alphonse Vinet; but his father dying when he was quite little, the widow, in 1837, married a merchant of Alexandria. This gentleman was French on his mother's side of the house and Egyptian on his father's, and very rich. He was extremely fond of his wife's child by her first marriage, insisted on his taking his name, and when he died, in 1842, left him a fortune of about £20,000. Money makes money, and Osman Digna, at the age of fifty, is probably very rich in real property, and also in the prestige which accompanies wealth in Eastern countries.

The Women's Suffrage question seems to be commanding almost as much attention in France as it does here. Though our Gallic neighbours reverence the weaker vessels chiefly as wives and mothers, they think that widows who may be good women of business, and are left by their husbands to manage large industrial establishments, ought to have the privilege of voting. The difficulty is to extend electoral powers to experienced widows without including inexperienced maids and matrons.

The French Consul at Zanzibar has written to the Geographical Society a sad account of the scarcity of food in Central Africa. He says that famine drives the wretched natives to seek the Arab agents of the slave trade in order to obtain food. They sell their wives and children and finally themselves, and prices have fallen so low that the market value of a man is about three shillings and eightpence, and that of a young woman seven and six.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

After the Fall of Khartoum, the lamented death of Gordon, and the defection or destruction of the Egyptian garrisons, to prevent all which events was the object of the Nile Expedition, a new War in the Soudan is undertaken by our Government. It is a war to be conducted from a new base of operations, the Souakim and Berber line, with an army to be doubled by the addition of ten thousand British and Indian troops landing on the Red Sea, and with objects in view which must be essentially different from those of the expedition sent out last year. The present military undertaking must be designed either to relieve Lord Wolseley's army on the Nile from a very difficult position, or to effect the conquest of the Soudan; but the latter purpose cannot readily be attributed to our Government, since Mr. Gladstone, speaking on May 12 in the House of Commons, indignantly repudiated the idea of "a war of conquest against people rightly struggling to be free"; and it may therefore be supposed that the safety and convenient withdrawal of our army, by the Berber and Souakim route, is the real end of the proposed operations. These, however, already seem likely to be on a scale of magnitude and cost equal to that of the recent expedition up the Nile; employing nearly the same amount of military forces added to those now under Lord Wolseley's command, and involving the construction of a railway from the seacoast to Berber, which place is destined apparently to be the head-quarters of the army during the summer months. Without presuming here to criticise the new plan or the new policy which has been adopted, but merely indicating its direction in order that our weekly reports may be intelligible to the ordinary reader, we proceed to give a summary of the incidents made known since Thursday of last week, and to notice the particular subjects represented in our Special Artist's Sketches and other Illustrations now published.

The later accounts of the catastrophe at Khartoum differ in some of the details from those first received. On Saturday last, an Arab, who says he was an eye-witness of the affair, reached Lord Wolseley's head-quarters at Korti, having travelled on a camel across the Desert to Debbeh, whence he was conveyed by the river to Korti in a steam-pinnace under command of Lieutenant Reid, R.N. He calls himself Abdul Kerim, a native of Wady Halfa, and describes himself as a servant of General Gordon. He states that Khartoum was delivered to the enemy by Faragh Pasha, the commander of Gordon's Soudanese troops, who, early in the morning on Jan. 27, treacherously opened the gate in the southern wall. The Mahdi's fighting men were close at hand, and at once rushed into the town. General Gordon, hearing the noise, went out, armed with a sword and axe. He was accompanied by Ibrahim Bey, the chief clerk, and twenty men. He went towards the house of the Austrian Consul. On his way he met a party of the Mahdi's men, who fired a volley, and General Gordon was shot dead. The Arabs then rushed on with their spears, and killed the chief clerk and nine of the men; the rest escaped. The Austrian Consul, Herr Hansal, was also killed; the Greek Consul Nicola is alive, and a prisoner; all the rest of the Europeans were killed, also most of the notables. The bulk of the inhabitants fraternised with the Mahdi's men. With the exception of the firing upon General Gordon's party, there was no fighting whatever. No women or children were killed, and all who surrendered and gave up their valuables were allowed to go away without harm. The Mahdi is reported to have hanged the traitor Faragh. His troops were, when the man left Khartoum, still too much occupied by the plunder of the town to think of moving forward against Gubat. Indeed, a great many of the Mahdi's best troops were killed at Metammeh. The people employed in the arsenal, for the most part Greeks, were killed by the Mahdi's men. The only person beside Consul Nicola spared and kept as prisoner was the doctor. All the others were kept prisoners for three days and then allowed to go free. The Mahdi did not enter the town until three days after its capture, and then only remained there for a short time. Faragh Pasha was a black slave; he was given his freedom and advanced by General Gordon, who trusted him implicitly. The Arab, Abdul Kerim, adds that all the Europeans in Khartoum who refused to become Mussulmans were killed. His story is regarded at Korti as being circumstantial enough to be true, and it fully confirms Sir Charles Wilson's report, which was at first much doubted in official quarters there.

We published, in the later portion of our last week's impression, the news of Thursday morning, contained in a dispatch from Lord Wolseley to the War Office, announcing a battle fought on Tuesday, the 10th inst., against the Monassir and Robatat tribes, by the brigade of Major-General Earle, on the banks of the Nile, opposite Dulka Island, seventy-five miles above Merawi. The British force, consisting of the South Staffordshire (38th) and 42nd Royal Highlanders (Black Watch) regiments, won a complete victory, fighting at a place called Kerbekan, on very rugged and difficult ground at the head of the Shukook Pass. But this victory was dearly purchased by the deaths of the able and experienced commander, Major-General Earle, and of Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny, commanding, respectively, the two excellent regiments above named. Portraits of these three gallant officers are given in our present publication. The other losses on the British side amounted only to four or five soldiers of each regiment killed, and several officers, including Lieutenant-Colonel Wauchope, Captain A. B. Horsbrugh, and Lieutenants the Hon. J. Colborne and T. F. Kennedy severely wounded, besides nearly forty wounded soldiers. The loss of the enemy is reckoned at five hundred or more. Colonel Henry Brackenbury, R.A., C.B., who took command of General Earle's force after the death of that officer, has been raised to the position of Brigadier-General. He will continue to hold command of the advanced force on the river Nile in future operations upon Abu Ahmed and Berber. Lord Wolseley has telegraphed to the Khedive that he believes that the road to Berber by the Nile is now clear, and that there will be no further fighting until the British column under General Brackenbury reaches that place.

With reference to the previous movement of General Earle's column up the Nile from Korti, by Merawi, the Gerendid Cataract, and Handab, which has been described in former accounts of this campaign, we now present two Illustrations of Merawi (from Abou Dom, the opposite bank of the river) and of the camp at Handab, which are supplied by the Sketches we received from the late Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny, made by that officer, some days before his death, expressly for the use of this Journal.

The force now commanded by Brigadier-General Brackenbury, ascending the Nile in boats, still have about 200 miles of waterway to traverse before they reach Berber, and, as it is not expected that they will be able to do more than six or seven miles a day, they cannot reach that place, even if no opposition is offered on the way, much before March 10. General Earle had with him, all told, 115 officers and nearly 3000 men. At Gubat there are 50 officers and 1000 men, and General Buller has arrived there with reinforcements that bring the strength up to 97 officers and 2300 men, a force strong enough to warrant an assault of Metammeh. At Korti General Wolseley has 82 officers and 1500 men, and on Nile communications about 2000 men and 40 officers. All told, Lord Wolseley's force numbers 450 officers and 9600 men.

The public anxiety regarding the condition of Sir Herbert Stewart has been greatly relieved by the announcement made on Wednesday that Sir Herbert is doing well, and that he is among the wounded who are being conveyed to Korti. The convoy of all remaining sick and wounded, seventy-five all ranks, commanded by Colonel Talbot, left Gubat early morning of 13th inst., and reached Abou Klea safely. Eight or nine miles distant from Gubat, they halted for breakfast, and when about to resume the march, had a long skirmish with a convoy of men, guns, and ammunition on the way from Khartoum to Metammeh. The skirmish lasted about one hour and a half, when the enemy retreated. The Light Camel Regiment, on its way from Abou Klea to Gubat, arrived towards the close of the skirmish. The British loss was one man killed and five wounded.

In view of the proposed reinforcement of the troops in Egypt, it is interesting to note that the total number of infantry battalions in that country and the Soudan, according to the latest official return, was twelve, that number, however, having been increased by the arrival of the 2nd Royal Sussex Regiment from Malta. These are made up as follow:—1st Battalion Cameron Highlanders, 1st Gordon Highlanders, 1st Royal West Kent, 1st Royal Irish, 1st Berkshire Regiment, 2nd Essex, 1st Royal Highlanders, 1st South Staffordshire, 1st Royal Sussex, 2nd Royal Sussex, 2nd Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry, 1st Yorkshire, 2nd East Surrey. There are also five batteries of Artillery, four companies of Engineers, exclusive of the Telegraph Battalion and Field Park, the Camel Corps, Mounted Infantry, two companies of the Commissariat and Transport Staff, one company of the Ordnance Corps, and one regiment of cavalry, the 19th Hussars, the Marines, and the Naval Brigade.

The following is a list (nominal strength) of the additional troops now under orders for the Soudan, Lower Egypt, and the Mediterranean:—Royal Horse Artillery, G-B Brigade, with four guns, also Field Artillery and Garrison Artillery; Cavalry, 5th Lancers, two squadrons, and 20th Hussars, two squadrons; Royal Engineers, 24th Company, also Telegraph Section and Balloon Detachment; Infantry, 3rd Grenadier Guards, 830 rank and file; 1st Coldstream Guards, 800 men; 2nd Scots Guards, 800 men; 2nd Durham Light Infantry, 870 men; 1st Dorsetshire, 800 men; 1st Shropshire, 850; 3rd Rifle Brigade, 897; 3rd Royal Dublin Fusiliers, 910; 1st Cheshire, 640; 2nd East Surrey, 800; and 1st Yorkshire, 700; Commissariat and Transport Corps, four Mounted Companies, and four not mounted; Medical Staff Corps, two Bearer Companies, and four or five Field Hospitals; Ordnance Store Corps, Veterinary Departmented, and Military Mounted Police. The whole force, it is understood, shows 11,126—viz., 336 officers, 51 warrant officers, 10,739 men, 983 horses, and four guns—which will be dispatched, respectively, as follows:—To Souakim, 6713; Alexandria, 1829; Cairo, 54; Suez, 144; Gibraltar, 1582; and Malta, 824. Among the infantry force to be employed in the Souakim-Berber campaign are a battalion of eight companies of the Royal Marine Light Infantry, who have for over a year garrisoned Souakim; also three companies of the Royal Marine Artillery. The 9th Bengal Lancers, 15th Sikhs, 17th Bengal Infantry, and a Bombay native infantry regiment will arrive at Souakim about March 5; the British regiments some three days later.

Lieutenant-General Sir Gerald Graham, with his aides-de-camp and several officers, would start from London yesterday (Friday) evening for Souakim, viâ Paris and Brindisi. Major-General Sir George Greaves, Major-General Sir John C. M'Neill, and Commissary-General Robertson would start on the same day. The latter has been appointed Chief Commissariat Officer of the Expedition. Sir John C. M'Neill has appointed Lieutenant the Hon. A. D. Charteris, of the 1st Coldstream Guards, to be his aide-de-camp while in command of the second Brigade of the new expeditionary force. Surgeon-General Oliver Barnett has been appointed Principal Medical Officer in command of the Medical Staff and Army Hospital Corps about to be dispatched to Souakim.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge visited Aldershott on Saturday, and inspected the troops about to leave for the Soudan. With respect to the efficiency of all ranks the Commander-in-Chief expressed his satisfaction. He also inspected the Guards at Wellington Barracks and at Windsor on Wednesday, previous to their embarkation next day and Friday at Gravesend.

Her Majesty's Government has received the offer of New South Wales to equip and dispatch a battalion of infantry and a battery of artillery for service in the Soudan. An offer of assistance has also been received from Victoria. There is a similar offer from South Australia. The proposal of Colonel Williams to bring a regiment of Canadian Militia to England has not been declined.

Prince Hassan, the Khedive's brother, has been requested by the English Government, at Lord Wolseley's suggestion, to accompany the British Expedition in the character of Civil Commissioner. His Highness has expressed his willingness to take part in the operations, on condition that the Soudan be constituted an autonomous province of Egypt, and that an army of 3000 men, exclusively Mohammedans, shall be formed by him. It is stated that Prince Hassan has accepted the command of a troop of Egyptian cavalry in the Soudan Expedition.

The Government having approved the contract with Messrs. Lucas and Aird for the construction of a railway from Souakim in the direction of Berber, no time is being lost in making the necessary preparations, the contractors being instructed to carry out the work with the least possible delay. The Admiralty have been instructed to find tonnage for the conveyance of all the stock, locomotives, gear, rails, and sleepers, besides the staff of men. On Friday a staff of Messrs. Lucas and Aird's engineers and clerks would leave London for Souakim, viâ Brindisi, and two hundred navvies would be dispatched this week. It is believed that a large number of native labourers can be engaged at Souakim for the rougher and unskilled work. The route having been already surveyed, the actual construction of the line can be commenced without delay. The gauge is to be 4 ft. 8½ in., the rails being good flat-bottomed iron, laid upon wooden sleepers, and this is thought to indicate that the railway is intended to be of a permanent character, although the primary object of its construction is to bring stores from the base of General Graham's operations at Souakim to the nearest convenient spot at which his troops may be. The work is to be done in sections, as the Government may direct. Carriages are likewise to be provided, and several small six-wheel locomotives of an improved pattern.

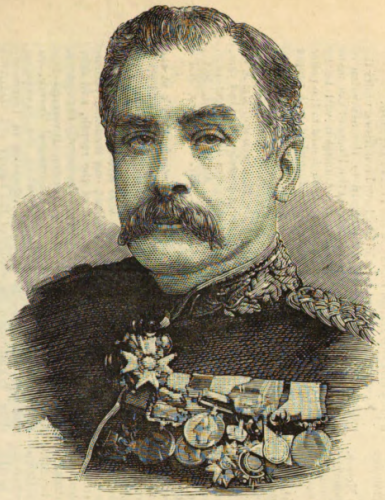
Our Illustrations this week comprise a Sketch by Mr. Melton Prior, our Special Artist, of the Head-quarters' Camp of Lord Wolseley at Korti, showing the respective positions of all the different corps there assembled, previously to the advance of Sir Herbert Stewart's brigade across the Desert and that of General Earle up the river to Merawi; another of Mr. Prior's Sketches, taken at the wells and halting-place of Abou Halfa, on the Desert march; the two Sketches by Lieut.-Colonel Coveny before mentioned, taken at Merawi and Handab in the progress of General Earle's column; and two more Views of Khartoum and Tuti Island, from the Sketches made in April, 1863, by Lieutenant-Colonel J. A. Grant, F.R.S., one of which shows the position that must have been reached by Charles Wilson's steam-boat, on the 28th ult., when he reconnoitred the aspect of the captured city. We also give an Illustration of the industrial activity which has been aroused in certain Government establishments in London, connected with the War Department, by the hurried preparations for the equipment of the large number of troops ordered to join the new military expedition to Souakim. The Army Clothing Factory at Pimlico, where about fifteen hundred hands are now employed in full work, can turn out nearly ten thousand suits of special service dress for soldiers in a week. The dresses furnished upon this occasion for the Soudan campaign are different from ordinary regimental uniforms, consisting of trousers and frock made of "kharki" or dust-brown drill, with "puggarees" or sun-helmets; "putties" for the mounted troops, which are strips of cloth to be wound about the legs, below the knee; broad belts of flannel to be worn round the waist, veils and goggle spectacles to protect the eyes. The needlework and sewing-machine work, as well as the cutting-out, performed on this wholesale scale at Pimlico, will be a most serviceable contribution to the great business of the war.

THE LATE LIEUT.-COLONEL COVENY.

By a remarkable and not less deplorable fatality, in the battle fought at Kerbekan, on the Nile, seventy-five miles above Merawi, by the force under Major-General Earle, C.B., on the 10th inst., among the few slain on our side were the General himself and the commanding officers of the two British regiments, the 42nd (Black Watch) Royal Highlanders and the 38th (South Staffordshire), immediately engaged in the conflict. Portraits of all three appear in our publication of this week. With respect to Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel R. C. Coveny, of the Royal Highlanders, we have to acknowledge, on behalf of the Illustrated London News, a very recent contribution from him of Sketches illustrating the advance of General Earle's column up the Nile from Korti to the country of the Monassir and Robatat tribes, where he and the other gallant officers above-named were to meet their death. We received, a few days ago, a letter from Major J. H. Sandwith, of General Earle's Staff, dated the 23rd ult. at Merawi, apprising us that he had, at the request of our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, kindly invited an officer to furnish Sketches for this Journal, and that Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny had promised to do us this service. This intimation was followed by a letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny, dated Jan. 22, at the camp of "Kerf-el-Handab," higher up the river, with eight capital Sketches of the route as far as Handab; of the British encampment there; of the Mudir of Dongola's Egyptian or Nubian troops; of Merawi and Abou Dom, on the opposite bank; of the view at the upper end of the Gerendid Cataract, just below Handab; and of other scenes which are interesting in connection with General Earle's advance along the route up the Nile. Two of the Sketches drawn by Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny are presented in our Extra Supplement, together with the Portrait of General Earle, and the others will be engraved next week. Lieut.-Colonel Coveny says, in writing to us, "Being informed by Major Sandwith, of the Head-quarters Staff, that you would like some sketches sent from this part of the Nile, I have much pleasure in sending you the inclosed, and hope they may be of some use to you." After some brief notes upon the particular subjects he has delineated, he concludes as follows:—"I shall do my best, as far as my duties will allow, to send you sketches on our way up the River to Abou Ahmed, where I believe we are going, as we are ordered to pack up our tents to-morrow and bivouac here. The tents are to be carefully put away in the boats, where they will not be in the way, as we do not expect to see them for three weeks' time." This was on the 22nd ult.; and we sincerely regret, not only, in common with all his acquaintance and society in general, the death of an esteemed and accomplished British officer, but our own loss of an opportunity to thank him, while living, for a service voluntarily rendered by him, in a most obliging manner, to this Journal and its readers.

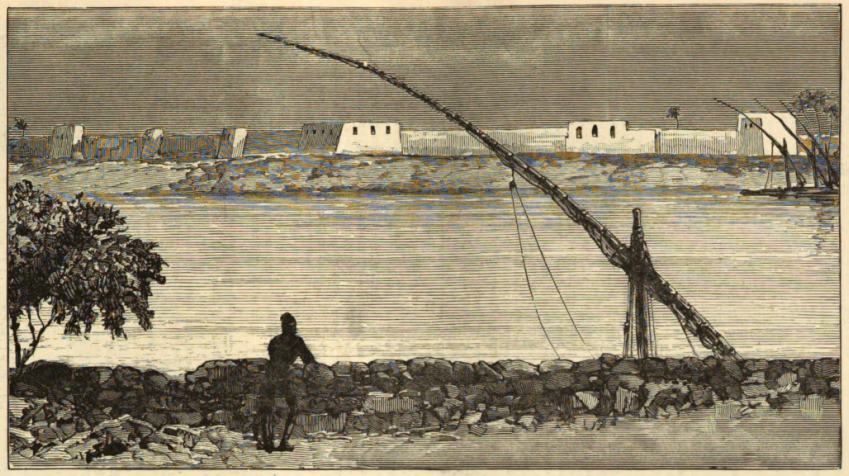
Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Charles Coveny was born Nov. 4, 1842. He received his commission as ensign of the 23rd Regiment in January, 1862, and in September of the same year was transferred to the 42nd (Royal Highlanders). He was appointed Lieutenant Jan. 30, 1866; Captain, May 8, 1875; Major, Sept. 29, 1882; and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel, Nov. 18, 1882. Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny took part in the Ashantee war, and was present at the several battles and the capture of Coomassie. He was engaged in the Egyptian Expedition, and was wounded at Tel-el-Kebir. He was also present at the battles of Teb and Tamai.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Mr. Van der Weyde (the Van der Weyde Electric Light process), 182, Regent-street.



The Italian Government have awarded the silver medal for acts of civil valour to Captain William Taylor, of the British schooner Constance, of Greenock, for rescuing from drowning a pilot and two Italian sailors in the Port of Leghorn.

New and stringent regulations have been issued under the authority of the Speaker with regard to the admission of strangers to the galleries and lobbies of the House of Commons during the sittings of the House. Admission will be by tickets, and strict instructions have been issued to the police to exclude all persons save such as are furnished with proper admissions.



Yesterday week the eighth annual meeting of the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom was held at Cannon-street Hotel, under the chairmanship of Mr. H. Green and Mr. J. G. Corrie successively, the former being president for last year, and the latter for this year. The delegates dined together in the evening, when Sir D. Murray, Mr. Norwood, M.P., Mr. Corry, M.P., Sir E. Reed, M.P., Mr. C. Wilson, M.P., and other gentlemen, made speeches.

An influential meeting was held yesterday week at the Mansion House to obtain further support for the Parkes Museum. It was shown that the Institution had done good public service. The Lord Mayor, who presided, and the Duke of Cambridge were among those who advocated the object aimed at. It was stated that at least one thousand pounds ought to be raised before the end of the month, and subscriptions beyond this amount were subsequently announced.

The third annual ball of the London Inverness-shire Association, will be held at the Freemasons' Tavern, on Friday, March 6. The objects for which the Association was instituted are:—To encourage education in Inverness-shire; to cultivate a knowledge of the history and traditions of the County and the Highlands generally; to assist, by every means in its power, deserving persons, natives of Inverness-shire, who may stand in need of the influence and assistance of the Association; and to promote friendly intercourse among Inverness-shire men, resident in or near London.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

Although times are bad, England is at war, the troops are mustering on the eve of their departure for the East, the political horizon is disturbed, and the civilised world is grumbling, there has seldom been seen such activity in the theatrical world, or so many novelties announced for immediate production. It is ever so. During the Crimean war; again, when North and South were enemies in America; and during the Franco-Prussian campaign, theatres, according to rumour, never did so well. People go to the playhouse to forget their trouble; and it is natural. Next Saturday an old friend will appear with a new face at the Court. Mr. James Albery, who some years ago did a capital version of Emile Augier's "Les Fourchambault" for the Haymarket, and called it "The Crisis," has revised his play according to modern tastes, and re-names it "The Denhams." Mrs. John Wood alone remains of the original cast, that included Louise Moodie, Miss Eastlake, and Charles Kelly; but surely efficient substitutes should be found in Lydia Foote, Marion Terry, and John Clayton, with Arthur Cecil thrown in for a small sketch of strong character. The play did extremely well at the Haymarket, and there is no reason why similar success should not attend it at the Court. It is an interesting human story; and, if Augier is not seen here at his very best, it is a valuable specimen of his work. The comedy was originally played by Got, Coquelin, Reichemberg, and Croizette, at the Français, in April, 1878.

Could any old playgoer, with the plays of a past generation at his fingers' ends, stand at attention and tell the story of "The Hunchback," by Sheridan Knowles? It is open to grave doubt if he could. It is one of the most popular "star" parts in the répertoire of a leading actress. Everyone who has acquired notoriety must have played Julia at some time or other, and yet nobody seems to know one word about the play or is attracted by its story. For fifty-three years "The Hunchback" has held the stage. It was originally performed at Covent Garden in 1832. Miss Fanny Kemble—happily now alive—was the Julia; Sheridan Knowles, the author, was Master Walter; Charles Kemble, Sir Thomas Clifford; Abbott was Modus, and Miss Taylor, Helen. For more than half a century playgoers have been dreaming over the periods and the platitudes of the literary Irishman who carried rhetoric into fact, and called it poetry. For once in a way, however, "The Hunchback" will have a chance. No one can go to sleep over the play when Miss Mary Anderson plays Julia. The cast includes Arthur Stirling, an excellent actor, the popular William Terriss, and Miss Pateman. If Mr. Abbey has been autocratic enough to cut freely at the dull dialogue, all will be well. Twenty years ago it was a heresy to say that Sheridan Knowles was a bore. But in these days we are more outspoken. And is it not a curious circumstance to find the two great authors of our fathers' theatrical days unburied in the same week? Sheridan Knowles on Tuesday; the late Lord Lytton on Thursday next. "Junius; or, The Household Gods," by Edward Bulwer, Lord Lytton, is, if report speak true, founded on the chapter of Roman history immortalised by Shakspeare in his poem, "The Rape of Lucrece." It was originally called "Brutus," and was offered successively to Samuel Phelps and Henry Irving for production at Sadler's Wells and the Lyceum. That the play so long buried will have ample justice done to it by Mr. Wilson Barrett and his clever company there can be no possible doubt, and the leading actors will look their parts. Mr. Barrett might have stepped off a Roman coin, and has as classical a face as Garnier, whose Justinian is such a striking performance in Sardou's "Theodora"; and surely Mr. Willard will look the Sextus Tarquinius of Macaulay, if not of Shakspeare or Lytton. "But when the face of Sextus was seen among the foes, a yell that rent the firmament from all the town arose. On the housetops was no woman but spat toward him and hissed; no child but screamed out curses and shook its little fist." Such plays should not be approached without serious reading. A course of Niebuhr, Martial, Merivale, Shakspeare, Macaulay, and Liddell is necessary before attending the shrine of "The Household Gods." The critics can no longer lounge on "triclinia" with the noble author of the play, or quaff Falernian called forth at his bidding ab imo cavernæ, crowned with chaplets of flowers; so his successor, who is sensitive on these points of hospitality, need not fear that justice will be done to the play and its brilliant author.

Saturday week will see a revival of "Masks and Faces" at the Haymarket, wherein Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft are seen at their very best as Triplet and Peg Woffington; and among the forthcoming novelties will be the long overdue drama by Mr. G. R. Sims at the Adelphi, which is anticipated with great eagerness, and the production, for the first time in London, at the Olympic Theatre, for the benefit of Mr. J. G. Graham, of the Spanish drama called "A Passion Flower; or, Woman and the Law." This will be an interesting occasion, for the whole of the original provincial company, including Mr. and Mrs. Bullen (Miss Fanny Brough), Mr. and Mrs. G. Canninge, and the charming child Maude Clitheroe, will appear.

Jane May, the pretty French actress who has succeeded Jane Hading at the French plays, seems determined to follow the art of suggestiveness, instead of the art of sweetness and nature. She was a clever imitator of Celine Chaumont in "Divorçons," and now she is equally facile as a follower in the footsteps of Judic in "Niniche," a play of which the less said the better. Without much voice, she knows how to express a ballad; but her style is too refined and her manner too gentle for these tricky, unsatisfactory representations of modern French life. In one department of our art we are infinitely superior to the French. They have no girls to play girls' characters in a natural manner. We have them in abundance. There is never any difficulty in finding the clergyman's daughter, or the squire's little sister, or one of those simple English maidens that M. Taine admired so much. Take a case in point, the play of "Denise," by Dumas, now being acted at the Français. There is a charming girl's part, Marthe, but it is spoiled by the mincing affectation of Reichemberg, who according to the traditions of the French stage makes her ridiculously affected, and consequently unnatural. Now, Jane May is exactly the actress who should have created Marthe and altered the artistic complexion of the play. She would have been as natural in her love as in her hate, in her wilfulness as in her resignation. Why does she not remain the ingénue, and leave "Divorçons" and "Niniche" alone?

C. S.

Mr. J. H. Cobbe's first annual benefit takes place at the Princess's this (Saturday) morning, when "Hamlet" will be performed by Mr. Wilson Barrett, Miss Eastlake, and full company; and this evening the 150th performance of Mr. Henry A. Jones's successful play "Saints and Sinners" will take place at the Vaudeville Theatre.

Miss Amy McNeil, who last year played a round of leading characters at the Surrey Theatre with gratifying success, has been engaged by Mr. Augustus Harris for his ensuing autumn dramatic season at Drury-Lane Theatre.

NEWS FROM NICE.—With the exception of a very few wet and cold days, the weather is again splendid. Not a flake of snow has fallen. The sun shines almost perpetually, and the influence of its warm rays makes life enjoyable to all, and more especially to those who have by impaired health sought its influence.
There are no epidemics, and the average mortality of the city in 1884 was less per mille than London and many fashionable towns in England.
The streets, roads, and sewers are constantly cleansed and disinfected, and watered from the mountain stream of the Vesubie. There are three English doctors and physicians in practice here—viz., Messrs. West, Wakefield, and Sturge, and they will be glad to communicate with any intending visitors as to the healthfulness of the town.
The effects of the recent storm (the like of which has been unknown for thirty-five years) were comparatively trifling, and repaired in twenty-four hours. In some few low-lying rooms and cellars, near the Fish Market, the wash from the spent waves had entered, but this was soon pumped out by the firemen and military.
Visitors are hastening in increasing numbers, as is their wont at this season, and the approach of Carnival, which report says will be the best on record. The Municipal Theatre will open immediately, and the Théâtre Français, of which Mr. Cortelazzo continues the able Director, has several Star Artists for the Opera Comique, and an excellent Troupe de Comédie.
The Carnival and Regatta will be fully announced with other fêtes.

MUSIC.

The Crystal Palace Saturday afternoon concerts were resumed last week with the eleventh performance of the twenty-ninth series—after the usual interval appropriated to Christmas and New-Year's entertainments. A new overture, entitled "Richard I.," by Mr. C. H. Couldery, was performed for the first time at these concerts. Although not showing any special relation to the subject of its title, it is, nevertheless, a work of considerable merit, both in subject and treatment. Another first performance at the Crystal Palace was that of an "Adagio" for violin, with accompaniment of small orchestra, composed by Mozart in 1776—a charming piece of expressive melody. The principal violin part was ably sustained by Mr. Carl Jung. Madame Essipoff gave a fine rendering of Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat ("The Emperor") and unaccompanied solos, and Mdlle. A. Soubré (from Paris) made a favourable impression by her refined singing in French airs by Massenet and C. De Grandval. Other features of the programme call for no comment. Mr. Manns received the usual welcome on his reappearance as conductor.

Last Saturday's afternoon Popular Concert included the first appearance this season of Herr Joachim. The renowned violinist received the same enthusiastic greeting to which he has been accustomed during the many years of his association with these concerts. His solo performances were in the Recitative and Adagio from Spohr's Sixth Concerto; and, for the encore, two movements from the second of Bach's Sonatas for Violin, without accompaniment, all of which were admirably rendered, as was the violinist's leading share of Mendelssohn's string quartet in E minor. Herr Max Pauer again made a successful appearance as solo pianist; and Mr. W. Mills obtained much deserved applause for his effective delivery of Schubert's "Wanderer" and a song by Handel.—Herr Joachim appeared, for the second time, at this week's Monday evening concert, at which he played, with the same success as on many past occasions, the "Chaconne" from one of Bach's sonatas for violin without accompaniment, and another movement in reply to the encore; besides having been the leading violinist in the concerted music. Miss Agnes Zimmermann was the pianist and Miss Thudicum the vocalist.

Last Saturday was a busy day in the musical world. In addition to the performances adverted to above, evening concerts were given at the Royal Albert Hall and St. James's Hall. In the former instance, St. Valentine's Day was celebrated by one of Mr. W. Carter's grand national festival concerts, at which Mr. Sims Reeves and other eminent artists appeared. Our great tenor was in excellent voice, and sang four popular songs with great effect.

The Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society gave a public concert at St. James's Hall last Saturday evening, when the performances of a band of nearly one hundred instrumentalists, under the direction of their conductor, Mr. N. Megone, proved that good progress has been made since the formation of the society. A specialty in the programme was a concerto by Julius Tausch for six kettle-drums (differently tuned) with orchestral accompaniments. The drums were manipulated with great skill by Mr. Gordon Cleather. Madame Osborne Williams and Mrs. Hutchinson contributed effective vocal performances.

Madame Essipoff's pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall, announced for last Monday afternoon, was suddenly postponed on account of her indisposition.

Miss Cardigan—an accomplished young flautist—gave a recital at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on Tuesday afternoon, when, in various performances, solo and concerted, she displayed a good tone and fluent execution. Her coadjutors were Madame Frickenhaus (pianoforte), M. Libotton (violoncello), and Mr. I. McKay as vocalist.

Ash Wednesday was celebrated by a grand performance of "The Messiah" by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society (the eighth concert of the fourteenth season), and by a sacred concert at St. James's Hall, under the direction of Mr. John Boosey.

The fourth of the second series of Madame Jenny Viard-Louis' performances of Beethoven's works, at Prince's Hall, was announced for last Thursday afternoon.

The Bach Choir (directed by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt) was to open a new season at St. James's Hall on Thursday evening. The programme comprised Mr. C. H. H. Parry's music to scenes from Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound," the Pastoral Symphony from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," and "The Star of Bethlehem," a short oratorio by Friederich Kiel. Of the performances, we must speak next week.

"Saul" was announced for performance by the Handel Society at St. James's Hall this (Saturday) evening.

The Philharmonic Society enters on its seventy-third season next Thursday evening, with the first of a series of six concerts. The prize (twenty guineas) for a new overture has been awarded to Gustav Ernest, of London. There were ninety competitors. The work is to be performed at the society's second concert, on March 12.

Next Friday evening the Sacred Harmonic Society will perform Handel's little-known oratorio "Belshazzar," in commemoration of the bi-centenary of the composer's birth.

Signor Mario Costa will give an evening concert next Tuesday evening at Prince's Hall. Many eminent artistes have promised their assistance; and at the same place next Thursday afternoon, Mdlle. Louise Dousste (De Fortis) will give a concert recital, assisted by well-known artists.

The excellent harpist, Adolphus Lockwood (brother of the well-known London professor of the same instrument), died recently, at Munich, where he was held in deservedly high esteem.

The commanding officers intrusted with the task of selecting a site for the Easter Monday Volunteer Review, visited Brighton on Tuesday for the purpose of inspecting the ground. The site selected is almost the same as that chosen for the review which was held there in 1883.

Major Serpa Pinto, the distinguished Portuguese traveller, who is about to set out on a new African journey, proposes to start inland from the town of Mozambique, and to cross the continent, by way of Lake Tanganyika, to the Muropue district, with the view of meeting with the Portuguese Congo expedition.

The Vestry of Lambeth and the District Board of Works for Westminster have accepted the offer of £100 from the Metropolitan Public Garden, &c., Association, towards the cost of planting trees in the public thoroughfares, and the gift of four ornamental seats, to be placed, for the public use, in the passage which crosses the disused burial-ground of Christ Church, Westminster.

A fancy-dress ball, in aid of the funds of the British Home for Incurables, Clapham, will take place at the Freemasons' Hall on Thursday, April 16, under the immediate patronage of the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress and the President, Viscount Holmesdale, and the board of management of the institution. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress have consented to open the ball.

FINE ARTS.

At the Dudley Gallery there has been opened an exhibition of water colours, which may be regarded as the product of a transition period of the Art Society, of which the name is associated with the building. The amateur element, which for many years has had a large share in the management of the gallery, will in future give place to a body of professional artists. The members of the council are such as to justify the hope that at the Dudley Gallery both taste and knowledge will be brought to bear upon the selection of the works sent for exhibition. If on the present occasion there are no works of very great importance, there is, on the other hand, a very fair level maintained throughout the exhibition, especially in the landscapes. Mr. Walter Severn himself takes a new departure, as well as the society over which he presides, and in each of the works he contributes—"Waiting for a Breeze" (37) and "Cameron Bay" (183), both pleasant reminiscenses of Loch Lomond, as well as in his bit of Cornish coast, "Down Derry" (13)—he shows a far more successful attention to minute details than has been frequently the case heretofore. Mr. Herbert Marshall sends three very distinct specimens of his power: "Winter at the Lakes" (510), very delicate vignettes; a bold bustling bit of "The Tyne, below Newcastle" (485), and a poetic treatment of London (79) mist and fog at "Sunrise in Mid-Winter"—a subject of which Mr. Marshall has before now shown himself a master. In Mr. Medlycott, however, Mr. Marshall will find a young rival who is anxious to meet him on the same ground, and his views of London and the Thames are worthy of great praise: "Westminster, from Lambeth" (66), two "Views of Battersea" (39 and 324), and especially that of "St. Paul's and Blackfriars" (95), give very great promise. Mr. Eyre Watkin's "Wharfedale Beck" (104), Mr. Bradley's "Maple-durham" (247), a summer morning effect, Mr. J. J. Bannatyne's "Ardleish" (313), and Mr. A. De Breanski's "Temple Lock" (286), are some of the most attractive of the slighter sketches of English scenery. Mr. Weedon's "Norfolk Wherries on the Yare" (303), Mr. Donne's "Alps, after a Snowstorm" (337), and Mr. G. Mark's "Sunshine and Shadow" (380), are more ambitious attempts to deal with atmosphere—and are in each case very creditable. Mr. Lennard Lewis's "Josselin" (357), and Mr. Wake Cook's "Rye" (316), are interesting studies of attractive spots. And in a simpler mood, but not the less attractive, as giving an earnest of future work, mention should be made of Miss M. S. Grose's "Road Home from the Beach" (194), a bit of Breton coast, rendered with almost French feeling; and Miss Armstrong's unobtrusive "Study at Angmering" (342), which, however, has received but scant courtesy from the hangers. Amongst the subject pictures at the Dudley Gallery, Mr. F. Slocombe's "Interesting Tale" (31) and Mr. H. J. Johnstone's "Rival Claim" (184) are almost the only two which now call for special notice—both exhibiting a certain sense of humour and each telling its own story; and Mrs. Cecil Lawson's "Lily" (412) is a careful bit of flower painting, in which something more than mere technical skill is shown.

At the Old Bond-street Galleries, Messrs. Agnew have brought together an almost unique collection of water-colour drawings—chiefly the works of deceased artists. The attractions are numerous, and include, among many others, J. W. M. Turner's "Crook of Lune," one of his most highly-finished water colours, as well as "Simmer Lake, near Askrig," and "Kirkby Lonsdale Churchyard," by the same artist, all of which were engraved for Whitaker's "History of Richmondshire." Two other Turner water-colours, "The Transept and the Chapter House of Salisbury Cathedral," forming a portion of the series of which two are already at South Kensington, are interesting not only from the exquisite care they display, but as the best specimens of the architectural phrase of Turner's art. They may here be contrasted with Prout's "Rouen Cathedral," David Roberts' "Alhambra," and James Holland's "Jesuits' Church at Venice." The landscape painters are further represented by Copley Fielding's magnificent expanse of the Brighton Downs, James Orrock's and P. De Wint's river scenery of the Midlands and East Anglia, and, among the more recent artists, by H. W. B. Davis's Picardy sketches, T. B. Hardy's numerous Venetian and English coast scenes, and a very remarkable collection of minutely finished works by Birket Foster, the originals of the numerous illustrations which that artist used to produce with such apparent facility. Amongst the figure subjects, there is a very interesting sketch by Mr. Millais, evidently done at an early period. It is absolutely unintelligible, in spite of its title, "The Sick Child," representing as it does, a cradle in a well-furnished room, over which a woman is leaning—in the background a man is eating and drinking at a table, whilst round the cradle in the foreground the sheep have peacefully curled themselves up as if in their pastures. Mr. J. D. Linton's "Fair Lady" is another early work of an artist who has since attained distinction, and it is in this case chiefly noteworthy as showing the influence exercised upon him at that period by Rossetti and Burne Jones. Altogether, the Bond-street Gallery offers the most ample assurance that an hour in it will be spent agreeably and profitably.

If the Nineteenth Century Art Society continues to progress at the rate shown by its last two exhibitions, it will not be long ere it takes up a position of importance among the exhibitions of the year. Constituted as it is, there must, in each succeeding year, always be a predominance of works from the artists who maintain their membership. Mr. Edwin Calvert's "Pasture-land" (160), conceived in somewhat a French style, is one of the most successful landscapes in any of the winter exhibitions. Scarcely less praise is due to Mr. Henry S. Tuke's "On the Cliffs at Newlyn" (151), a young girl amongst the fisher-folk and their dried fish. "Supper-Time" (112), by Mr. Charles Collins, despite a certain staginess and effort, shows very good work; whilst Mr. W. E. Norton's "Bits of Thames Scenery" (25) and "Loading-Up" (19) are pleasant reminiscences of the summer, of which Mr. W. Lomas' "Girl Punting" (13), with the glimpse of river in the background, is a more elaborate treatment, and, though somewhat unequal in execution, has some happy touches. Mr. Trood has returned once more to dog life, in the portraiture of which he has already achieved no small success. Of his pictures here "A Morning Call from the Castle" (68) and "How Happy could I be with Either" (102) will probably be the most popular: but in the action of the dogs who have "Just Found" (28), the poor hare in their power, there is a great deal of spirit and truthful drawing.

In water colours the Society is very well represented, and it is interesting to remark what attraction architectural subjects have for so many. Mr. Barraud finds his best subject at "Ghent" (335), Mr. Richardson at "Canterbury" (346), Miss S. Beale in "Trafalgar Square" (341), and Miss Edith Pradez in "Rome" (323). Among the landscapes which will attract notice are Mr. T. Payne's "Rough Road, near Bath" (338), Miss Foster's "South Devon Coast" (327), and Mr. R. H. Nibb's "Shore at Schevening" (300), whence the boats are just setting out on the grey sea.

The collection of the marine and yachting sketches by Mr. W. Ayerst Ingram, now on view at Messrs. Dowdeswells' (133, New Bond-street), is evidence of the artist's industry as well as of his skill. They are chiefly commendable for their freshness—suggestive of the yacht-deck, the hillside, and the sea-girt cliffs, rather than of the studio and the lamp. Mr. Ingram has as many manners as the sky has moods, but he is happiest on the south coast and in the sunset glow. "Brixham from the Custom House" (5) and the same at "Golden Eve" (24), "Penzance when the Tide is out" (18) and "At Parting Day" (45), are amongst the most successful; whilst "A Drifting Match" (19) is by far the most poetic "arrangement" of yachts in a hazy calm, and a picture for which the artist would have done well to borrow Mr. Black's title of "White Wings."

It is somewhat difficult to classify the two new pictures by Mr. E. Long, R.A., now on view in Old Bond-street, representing an episode in the life of Zeuxis. The Greek painter had been invited by the devout people of Crotona to paint a picture of Helen for the Temple of Juno. In order to obtain a perfect model, he was allowed to select five of the most beautiful maidens of the town, whose combined charms were to furnish the attributes of the ideal beauty. In the first of the two pictures, Mr. Long represents Zeuxis as a critic, selecting his models from among a bevy of fair girls; in the second, he is seen as an artist, surrounded by the five chosen maidens. A work of this nature serves very well to bring out Mr. Long's special aptitudes as well as his special failings. The figures in both pictures are dexterously grouped, the colour is harmonious, and, except in the case of Zeuxis' dark chiton, is subdued; and there is more than one pretty face and graceful pose—especially that of the nude figure seated on the couch in the second picture. In the drapery, however, of both pictures, there is something hard and monotonous, and the modelling is often defective; whilst the faces, which presumably are here Italian, seem to have done duty on previous occasions as Jewesses, Egyptians, or as denizens of whatever country Mr. Long may happen to be making the subject of his archæological studies. In spite of these drawbacks, and perhaps in a measure in consequence of them, both pictures offer many points of interest, and will become deservedly popular. As engraved works, we think they will gain very perceptibly, as the discordant note struck by the black lyre at the feet of the girl posing will be softened down, and the delicately painted backgrounds of both works, which are now lost, will assume their correct value.

THE LATE MAJOR CARMICHAEL.

Major Ludovick Montefiore Carmichael, of the 5th Royal Irish Lancers, who fell at the battle of Abou Klea on the 17th ult., was distinguished for his high literary and scientific ability, as well as for his military knowledge. He had enjoyed the advantage, rare in his day, of a University training, being a member of Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated as a Senior Optime in 1859, and subsequently proceeded M.A. He was a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, and had been a corresponding member of the council of the Royal United Service Institution. The esteem in which Major Carmichael's abilities were held at Head-quarters Staff, where he had but lately finished his term of service as Deputy Assistant Quartermaster-General, has been recently shown in the exceptional tribute publicly paid to his memory by his old colleague, Colonel Cameron, by special permission of the authorities at the War Office. Major Carmichael was born at sea, in the Southern Indian Ocean, on Nov. 21, 1836, on the homeward voyage of his parents. He was the only son of Ludovick Carmichael, Esq., merchant in Calcutta, and grandson of Alexander Carmichael, Esq., Provost of Forres. His mother was the daughter and granddaughter of soldiers, being daughter of Captain Hughes, 52nd Light Infantry, who was the first aide-de-camp to the "Great Duke" during his Indian service; and granddaughter of General William Hughes, who, we believe, was also of the 52nd Light Infantry. His grandmother, the wife of the Provost of Forres, was daughter of Captain Grant, of Viewfield, of the Grants of Auchterblair, the services of some of whom are recorded in Stewart of Garth's "Sketches of the Highlanders and Highland Regiments." Several members of earlier generations of Major Carmichael's family, which had long been settled in Strathspey, served with distinction in India, Canada, and elsewhere. Among these may be recalled Colonel Lewis Carmichael, promoted for special service in Canada in 1839, and Major Robert Carmichael, 38th B.N.I., greatly distinguished at the siege of Bhurtpore. The late Major Carmichael's own regimental service was chiefly in India, whence he passed into the Staff College. While on Indian service, he acted as Brigade Major at the Camp of Exercise at Hassan Abdal. It may fairly be said that Major Carmichael was a soldier by descent as well as by choice. It is not a little singular that he should have been at once the first of his name and the first of his Regiment (since its reconstitution as a Lancer Regiment) to fall on the field in the present century, notwithstanding the numerous members both of his own branch and of the chief line of his name who served in all the principal European and Indian wars of this century, from Lord Lake's days to the present time. And it is scarcely less singular that Major Carmichael's infant son, who survives, is in the third generation of only sons in his father's family, the immediate elder branch of which, about a century ago, made itself new homes in British North America and in the United States.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, Feb. 17.

To-day the streets of Paris are re-echoing with the inharmonious sounds of hunting-horns, bugles, and other instruments invented for the torture of human ears. The boulevards are crowded with holiday-makers, strolling aimlessly in their Sunday clothes, and straining to see the rare enthusiasts who still dress themselves up in motley garb to celebrate the Carnival. As usual, the newspapers are full of lamentations over the death of the Carnival, the disappearance of the old days of license and gaiety, the dulness of modern men and things, and the tiresomeness of modern pleasure. To speak frankly, there is not much ground for regrets; and it would be rather a blessing if the Parisians would determine, once for all, to bury the Carnival and have done with it. As it is, it is simply a pretext for all the scum and rif-raf of Paris to pass the nights in crapulous merriment in the infamous dancing-saloons on the exterior boulevards. During the "Jours gras" Paris is simply disgusting.

Yesterday, as chance would have it, the sightseers did not go forth to see entirely in vain. A spectacle was offered to them; only, instead of being a masquerade, it was a funeral—the funeral of Jules Vallès, the Communard. Naturally, this incident was taken advantage of by the revolutionaries, and a formidable Communist manifestation was made; but, as there were no police nor soldiers to interfere and complicate matters, the affair passed off without any attempts at rioting. The survivors of the Commune and some five thousand revolutionaries followed the body to the cemetery of Père-la-Chaise with cries of "Vive la Commune!" and "Vive la Révolution Sociale!" The same cries also figured as inscription on banners. One group carried a red flag; another group, representing the ideas of Louise Michel, carried a black flag; but the police had received orders to make no arrests, and not to interfere. The procession, however, was turbulent and disgraceful enough; and a group carrying a banner with the inscription, "Les Socialistes Allemands de Paris à Jules Vallès," provoked the anger of the students as the procession advanced along the Boulevard Saint-Michel. The students charged the cortége, threw mud and stones at the banner, and for some time there was a running fight, windows were broken, blood was shed, and even to the cemetery there was stone-throwing and cries of "A bas les Allemands!" Over the grave, several orators, including Rochefort, pronounced speeches and panegyrics of the Commune. The spectacle was scandalous in the extreme; but it is generally thought, even by the reactionaries, that the Government did wisely to leave the revolutionaries to themselves. Paris saw yesterday what these men are—a mere mob fighting amongst themselves.

Jules Vallès distinguished himself under the Empire as a violent and declamatory writer—a révolté and a réfractaire, as he called himself—became a member of the Commune, lived in exile at London, returned to Paris after the amnesty, and about a year ago started a revolutionary journal, Le Cri du Peuple, which became famous lately, thanks to the Ballerich scandal and the death, from wounds received in the office of the paper, of the police officer Norbert Ballerich. Under the Empire, Vallès was for a few months engaged as a sensational writer on the staff of the Figaro, at the rate of 30,000f. a year, which shows how highly his literary talent was esteemed. He has written also some autobiographical novels—"Jacques Vingtras," "Le Bachelier," and "L'Insurgé."

The Chamber has been occupied all the week with the debate on the grain question. It seems probable, that in spite of various amendments, the bill will be voted as presented by the Cabinet—that is to say, the French farmers will be encouraged to struggle against foreign competition by the imposition of a tax of 3f., or perhaps even 4f., per hectolitre on imported grain. The occupation of Lang-Son by the French troops provokes no great enthusiasm here. The general opinion seems to be that it is time to stop, and the newspapers of all shades of opinion say to M. Ferry, "Hold! Enough!"

OBITUARY.

VISCOUNT AVONMORE.

The Right Hon. Barry Nugent Yelverton, fifth Viscount Avonmore and Baron Yelverton, in the Peerage of Ireland, Lieutenant 1st Hampshire Regiment, died in camp at Kerbekan on the 13th inst., of enteric fever. He was born Feb. 11, 1859, the eldest son of William Charles, fourth Viscount Avonmore, Major Royal Artillery, by Emily Marianne, his wife, daughter of Major-General Sir Charles Ashworth, K.C.B., and widow of Professor Edward Forbes, F.R.S. After completing his education at Sandhurst, he entered the Army as Lieutenant 1st Hampshire Regiment, and went to Egypt with the Soudan Expedition. He was not married, and the family honours, conferred in 1795 on the eminent orator and lawyer, Barry Yelverton, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland, now devolve on his only surviving brother, Algernon William, sixth Viscount Avonmore, who was born Nov. 19, 1866.

COLONEL MABERLY.

Colonel William Leader Maberly, formerly M.P., died on the 8th inst., at his residence in Gloucester-place, Portman-square. He was born in 1798, the son of Mr. John Maberly, of Shirley House, Croydon, M.P. for Abingdon, and early in life entered the Army, from which he retired with the rank of Lieut.-Colonel in 1832. He first sat in Parliament for Westbury in 1819, subsequently for Northampton 1820 to 1830, for Shaftesbury 1831-2, and finally for Chatham 1832 to 1834. In the latter year he retired, on his appointment to the Secretaryship of the General Post Office. He had previously held office as Clerk of the Ordnance. Colonel Maberly, a consistent Liberal, was one of the last survivors of the unreformed House of Commons. He married, Nov. 11, 1830, the Hon. Catherine Charlotte Prittie, daughter of the Hon. Francis Aldborough Prittie, of Corville, county Tipperary, and sister of Lord Dunalley, by whom (who died in 1875) he had an only child, William, who died in 1867.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL EYRE.

Lieutenant-Colonel Philip Homan Eyre, of the South Staffordshire Regiment (late 38th), was killed at the battle of Kerbekan on the 10th inst. He was born in 1832, the second son of Mr. Richard Eyre, who was grandson of Richard Eyre, M.P., and grandnephew of John, Lord Eyre, of Eyrecourt. Bent on military life, he entered the Army as a private, but remained only a short time in the ranks, being given a commission in the 38th Foot in 1854. With that regiment he was in the Crimean campaign, for which he obtained the medal with clasp and also the Turkish medal. During the Indian Mutiny, he was at the capture of Lucknow and the battles of Barree and Nugger. In 1858 he was made Adjutant, in 1862 Captain, 1876 Major, and in 1881 Lieutenant-Colonel. During the Egyptian war of 1882, he commanded the half battalion in the reconnaissance in force from Alexandria, and was specially mentioned in despatches. He was very highly esteemed by his brother officers and the soldiers of his regiment. Colonel Eyre married Lucy Catharine Louisa, only daughter of Mr. William Clarke, of Clifton, and leaves two children. A Portrait of this officer is given on another page, from a photograph by Messrs. Falklands, of Clifton.

He was born Nov. 17, 1829, and was formerly in the Bengal Cavalry, but in 1863 exchanged into the 94th Foot, and retired from the service two years afterwards.

The Hon. Edward Cecil Curzon, J.P. and D.L., uncle of the present Lord Zouche, of Haryngworth, and second son of the Hon. Robert Curzon, M.P., by his wife, Harriett Anne, Baroness Zouche, in her own right, on the 12th inst., aged seventy-two. He was called to the Bar in 1840, and for some years held the office of Registrar of Designs.

The Rev. Thomas Worsley, D.D., Master of Downing College, on the 16th inst. The deceased, who had been Master of Downing ever since 1836, and was eighty-seven years old, had taken no public part in University affairs for many years. He graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1818, was Vice-Chancellor of the University in 1837, and subsequently Hulsean lecturer.

Miss Gilbert, the lady president of the Association for Promoting the General Welfare of the Blind. The industrious blind have sustained a severe loss by her death. She was the eldest daughter of Dr. Gilbert, late Bishop of Chichester, and being at an early age suddenly struck with blindness, brought on by an illness, she devoted her life and energy for the benefit of her fellow-sufferers.

Madame Sainton-Dolby, the eminent contralto singer, on the 18th inst., aged sixty-four. She was educated at the Royal Academy of Music, and, on entering on her profession, resolved to eschew the tempting opportunities offered by the lyric stage, that she might devote her talents exclusively to the illustration of our national music and to the interpretation of the oratorio works of Handel and other great masters. In this branch Miss Dolby was soon allowed to be without a rival. Mendelssohn, upon hearing her in his oratorio of "St. Paul," dedicated to her a set of six songs, and composed other works expressly for her. Miss Dolby, in the zenith of her fame, became the wife of Mr. Sainton, the violinist. The preservation of the English ballad, in its pathos and simplicity, is mainly owing to the steady and well-directed efforts of Madame Sainton-Dolby, who retired from the practice of her profession in 1870; but in the following year she opened a vocal academy for the training of lady vocalists who intended to adopt a musical career.

THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL EARLE.

The death of this distinguished commanding officer, on the 10th inst., in the ably conducted and perfectly successful engagement of the force which he led at Kerbekan, near Dulka Island, on the Nile seventy-five miles above Merawi, is deeply regretted by his professional comrades and by his countrymen at home. He was born May 18, 1833, the third son of Sir Hardman Earle, Bart., of Allerton Tower, near Liverpool, by Mary, his wife, second daughter of Mr. William Langton, of Kirkham, Lancashire. He was educated at Harrow, and entered the Army in 1851, joining the 49th, now the Berkshire Regiment. His first services were in the Crimea, at the battles of Alma and Inkerman, and the siege of Sebastopol, including the sortie of Oct. 26, and the assault on the Redan on June 18, for which he obtained the medal with three clasps and the Medjidieh. Exchanging from the 49th into the Grenadier Guards, he acted as Instructor of Musketry and Adjutant until 1863, when he became Lieut.-Colonel. In 1870 he obtained his Colonelcy, and was promoted Major-General in 1880. After filling military appointments at Gibraltar, in Canada, and in India, he was made, in 1882, Brigadier-General to the Expeditionary force sent to Egypt, and commanded the base and lines of communication. He was mentioned in despatches published in the Gazette of Oct. 6 and Nov. 2 of that year, was thanked by both Houses of Parliament, awarded the medal and clasp, bronze star, created a Companion of the Order of the Bath, and awarded the Second Class of the Medjidieh. On the commencement of the present operations, Major-General Earle, who was commanding the garrison at Alexandria, was at first designated for the supreme command, Lord Wolseley, however, being ultimately selected for this post. The deceased officer, whose later regimental career was passed in the Grenadier Guards, attained the rank of Major-General on Oct. 31, 1880. His full list of staff service was as follows:—Aide-de-Camp to Chief of the Staff in the Crimean War from October, 1855, to June, 1856; Assistant Military Secretary at Gibraltar from May, 1859, to October, 1860; Brigade Major in Canada from October, 1862, to January, 1863; Military Secretary in British North America from June, 1865, to October, 1870; Military Secretary to the Viceroy of India from May, 1872, to April, 1876; Colonel on the Staff at Chatham from March, 1880, to August of the same year; Colonel on the Staff of the South-Eastern District at Shorncliffe from August, 1880, to March, 1881; Brigadier-General on the Expeditionary force in Egypt, from August, 1882, to October, 1882; Major-General on the Staff in Egypt, from October, 1882, to date. In private life Major-General Earle was very popular, and Lord Wolseley has in him lost a valuable colleague in the operations in the Soudan.

General Earle married, July 1, 1864, Mary, second daughter of General Sir William J. Codrington, G.C.B., at one time Commander-in-Chief of the British forces in the Crimea, son of Admiral Sir Edward Codrington, G.C.B., who commanded at Navarino. He leaves two daughters, Rachel and Grace.

Our Portrait of General Earle (in the Extra Supplement) is from a photograph supplied by Mr. William Luks, of Bedford-square.

Mr. Gerald Fitzgerald, C.M.G., has been selected to fill the appointment of Accountant-General of the Navy.

From Mitchell's "Newspaper Directory," just issued, it appears that there are now in London 405 newspapers; in the provinces, 1202; in Wales, 72; in Scotland, 184; in Ireland, 161; and in the British Isles, 21—the total thus being 2052. The magazines and reviews number 1298, of which 335 are of a decidedly religious character.

A large number of the unemployed met on Monday afternoon on the Thames Embankment, and, after hearing some speeches respecting their condition and its cause, proceeded to the Local Government Board office, were they were received by Mr. Russell (in the absence of Sir Charles Dilke, who had to attend a Cabinet Council). After hearing the views of their spokesmen, Mr. Russell declined to discuss several matters, as his department had nothing to do with them. As to public improvements, the Board could sanction an outlay, but they could not force the local authorities to do any work.

Our Portrait of Lieutenant-General Sir Gerald Graham, V.C., K.C.B., the distinguished officer appointed to command the new Soudan Expedition at Souakim, is from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company. Sir Gerald Graham, who about this time last year commanded the force sent to Souakim against Osman Digna, and won the battles of El Teb and Tamai, is about fifty-four years of age, and is the son of a medical gentleman in Cumberland. He is an officer of the Royal Engineers, who served at the siege of Sebastopol, and in China, and commanded a brigade in the Egyptian campaign of 1882.

In the memoir of Colonel Sir Charles William Wilson, R.E., which appeared in our last, it was stated, and in part we believe correctly, that he was educated at Cheltenham; but our attention has been drawn to the fact that he was in the Upper School of Liverpool College, a most excellent institution, from 1845 to 1852, and there had the advantage of being instructed, successively, by two very eminent scholars, the late Rev. W. J. Conybeare and the present Dean of Chester, the Very Rev. Dr. Howson, joint authors of the well-known "Life of St. Paul." Sir Charles Wilson himself has contributed much to researches concerning Biblical antiquities for the Palestine Exploration Fund Committee, and the degree of D.C.L. was conferred upon him by the University of Oxford upon this account.

THE CHURCH.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has arrived at Lambeth Palace, where letters should be addressed.

We learn that the revised version of the Old Testament will be published immediately after Easter.

The Rev. R. F. Wilson, Vicar of Rownhams, Prebendary of Salisbury, and Examining Chaplain to the Bishop, has been elected Proctor in Convocation for the clergy of the diocese of Winchester, in place of Canon Sumner, who sits now as Archdeacon of Winchester.

It has been decided that the public memorial to the late Dean of Bangor shall take the form of a Scholarship at the University College for North Wales, an institution in whose foundation he evinced deep interest. About twelve hundred pounds has been collected. The Dean and Chapter have acceded to a request by Mrs. Symes, who recently presented a reredos, to be permitted to place in the chancel of the Cathedral a carved oak screen as a memorial to the late Dean Edwards.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, who is guardian of the spiritualities of the see of London during the vacancy, having issued his commission to the Bishop of Bedford to act for his Grace, the new chancel, side aisles, and transepts added to St. Stephen's Church, East Twickenham, were consecrated by Bishop Walsham-How last Saturday.—The Bishop-Designate of London has nominated Dr. Tozer, late Bishop of Central Africa, to assist the Bishop of Bedford in confirmations and other episcopal work in the diocese of London.

Messrs. Halstaff and Hannaford, of 228, Regent-street, have registered what they term a "Contribution Prayer Book." Within the cover of the Prayer Book, arrangement is made for holding money; it does not increase the size or detract from the appearance of the book; and it obviates the necessity for carrying a purse, thus avoiding the risk of having the pocket picked, or searching for loose money, which is frequently attended with noise or confusion during Divine service; while the exact sum intended to be contributed either for charity or payment for a sitting, can be regulated before leaving home. This novelty should be welcomed by the clergy.

Ewerby parish church has been enriched by a stained-glass window, from the studio of Mr. W. F. Dixon, 18, University-street, London, as a memorial to the late Earl of Winchilsea and Nottingham. It is the gift of the Hon. Finch Hatton, M.P., and his family.—An effective two-light Munich window has been placed in Great Bar church, near Birmingham, representing the delivery of St. Peter from prison.—The Church of St. Peter, Belsize Park, has received an addition to its painted glass of a window, from the studio of Mr. Taylor, of Berners-street, a gift to the church, by bequest of the late Mrs. Abram.—The work of placing two new memorial windows in old St. Mary's Church, Lambeth, has been completed. One window is to the memory of Archbishop Tait, and the other memorialises the thirty years' Rectorship of the Rev. J. F. E. Lingham, who was Rector of this important parish from 1854 to 1884.

The Rev. Edward S. Woods, Incumbent of Holy Trinity Church, Dover, for eighteen years, was recently presented with a pocket-book containing notes to the amount of £130, a specially prepared book with the names of the subscribers (283) illuminated in gold and colours, and an illuminated address on vellum, handsomely framed. Mr. Cromwell Marsh, on his own behalf, gave at the same time a Fitzroy barometer, surmounted by an eight-day clock, in oak, in remembrance of his twenty-seven years' continuous friendship with the rev. gentleman. The Archbishop has presented the Rev. E. S. Woods to the Vicarage of Ash, near Sandwich.

The Regius Professorship of Pastoral Theology in the University of Oxford, which Dr. King vacates on his appointment to the See of Lincoln, has, with her Majesty's permission, been offered to the Rev. Francis Paget, Vicar of Bromsgrove.—The Queen has appointed the Rev. H. M. Butler, D.D., Head Master of Harrow School, to the Deanery of Gloucester, which becomes void by the promotion of Dean Bickersteth to the See of Exeter.—The Rev. Ernest F. Letts, who has been Minor Canon and Preceptor of Manchester Cathedral since 1878, has been appointed to the living of All Saints', Newton Heath, void by the preferment of the Rev. St. Vincent Beechey, jun., to the Vicarage of St. John's, Cheetham Hill.—The Rev. Horace Newton, M.A., Vicar of Great and Little Driffield, has been appointed to the honorary canonry and prebend of Bugthorpe in York Minster, vacant by the death of Canon Simmons; the Rev. W. M. Smith-Dorrien, Curate of St. Martin's, Brighton, to the minor canonry and rectorship in Durham Cathedral, void by the resignation of the Rev. T. Rogers; the Rev. G. L. Towers, travelling secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, to the living of St. Margaret-at-Cliffe, vacant by the cession of the Rev. E. C. Lucey; the Rev. Edward Melford Mee, Fellow and Tutor of Queen's College, Oxford, to Crawley Rectory, Hants, vacant by the death of Archdeacon Jacobs; and the Rev. Mordaunt C. Crofton, Vicar-Designate of St. Peter's, Accrington, to the living of St. Stephen's, Bristol. The Record states that the Queen has offered the living of Christ Church, Hampstead, which has fallen to the nomination of the Crown by the designation of the Dean of Gloucester to the Bishopric of Exeter, to the Rev. George Frederick Head, M.A., Vicar of Charles, Plymouth, who has accepted the appointment. The Right Rev. Dr. Hellmuth, who was Bishop of Huron, Canada, from 1871 to 1883, and who acted for a short time as Suffragan to the late Bishop of Ripon, has accepted the offer of the Simeon trustees of the living of Bridlington, York, rendered vacant by the death of Canon Blakeney.

Under the presidency of Mr. Cooper Foster, the Hunterian Oration was given last Saturday by Professor John Marshall, in the theatre of the Royal College of Surgeons.

The Duke of Cambridge, as Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, held a Levée at the Horse Guards, Whitehall, on Tuesday afternoon. There was a full attendance of officers.

Mr. Charles Jerom Murch, of the Western Circuit, has been appointed by the Attorney-General Senior Prosecuting Counsel to the Post Office on that Circuit, in succession to the late Mr. Cole, Q.C.

Mr. Sidney Colvin, of Trinity College, has been re-elected to the Slade Professorship of Fine Art at Cambridge for a further period of three years. Mr. Colvin thus enters upon his fifth period of office.

The Earl of Glasgow has intimated reductions on his Fifeshire farms for the next five years. Lord Kinnaird has announced to his tenants his intention to make a reduction of from 15 to 20 per cent on crop 1884. A proprietor in Aberdeenshire has gone over his estate, and in some instances granted a reduction of 25 per cent.

The past week's arrivals of live stock and fresh meat at the port of Liverpool from the United States and Canada were not so large as those of the preceding week, and the total imports show a falling off in the shipments of both live stock and fresh meat to this country: the total of arrivals being 1969 cattle, 7597 quarters of beef, 1299 carcases of mutton, and 100 hogs. There were no arrivals of sheep.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, Feb. 18.

Owing to diminishing supplies of cash, the Money Market has maintained a moderately firm appearance, and at times short loans have commanded nearly 4 per cent per annum; but the demand for discounts has continued small in the extreme, and brokers find it no easy matter to maintain rates. In the course of the present month the market will be influenced by the home railway dividend payments, the Great Eastern and North-Eastern distributing, together, £999,000 on the 17th inst.; the London and South-Western, £330,000, and the Great Western, £672,408, on the 19th; the London and North-Western, £2,143,000, on the 20th; the Great Northern, £335,000, on the 23rd; and the Midland, £1,365,522, on the 28th. Business in the Stock Markets has naturally been checked by a feeling of uncertainty as to the development of events in connection with the Soudan, but on the whole, the movements in prices have been in favour of holders of securities. The English Funds have formed a prominent exception to the upward course, sales being made on a statement that, in order to meet the war expenditure, a suspension of the redemption of the Debt will be resorted to, which report will, it is to be hoped, prove unfounded. An advance has taken place in most of the leading foreign Government loans, Egyptian being especially firm on the satisfactory progress of the scheme for the arrangement of the finances of the country. Home railways have not altered much, but the changes have generally been on the favourable side; the traffic returns lately have been better than had been expected. American railways have had a material recovery, the publication of encouraging traffic returns for January assisting the rise. Canadian and foreign have also changed hands at higher prices.

Whereas the revenue receipts of the leading English railways for the past half-year showed a more or less important falling off, the working of the Irish lines shows in most cases increased receipts, and thus dividend payments have not only been maintained at rates equal to those for the same period of 1883, but the current half-year will be benefited by the addition of large balances brought forward. In the case of the Belfast and County Down Railway, 6 per cent per annum is to be paid, compared with 5 for the corresponding period. The Cork, Blackrock, and Passage Railway Company's distribution will be 2½ per cent per annum, which rate has been paid for each of the half-years ended December, 1881, 1882, and 1883. The Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Company maintains the dividend at 2 per cent per annum, this rate having been paid for the two previous half-years. The receipts of the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Company have been especially good, but an increase of expenditure has been necessary in order to improve the permanent way, on account of the higher speed of trains required to carry out the accelerated mail service. The Great Northern Company of Ireland will distribute 4½ per cent per annum, or the same rate of dividend as that paid for the second half of 1883.

The appearance of the balance-sheet of Lloyds, Barnetts, and Bosanquets Bank, Limited, has been looked forward to with considerable interest, as showing the result of the amalgamation which took place in April last—viz., of Lloyd's Banking Company, Limited, with Messrs. Barnetts, Hoares, Harnbury, and Lloyd, and Messrs. Bosanquet, Salt, and Co. Although the period which has elapsed since the amalgamation has not been favourable to banking profits, dividends equal to 20 per cent per annum have been announced, £10,000 added to reserve, raising that fund to £360,000, and a balance of £3107 carried forward. Comparing the figures in the present accounts with those in the accounts for 1883 of Lloyd's Banking Company, an increase is shown in capital from £490,000 to £750,000, while the reserve fund has risen from £300,000 to £360,000. The deposit and current accounts show an addition of about £3,000,000, the total last December being £9,524,803. In regard to the dividends, 20 per cent per annum had been paid for some years.

The committee of the general mortgage bondholders of the Wabash, St. Louis, and Pacific Railway Company have prepared a scheme of reorganisation, the chief points of which are a reduction to 5 per cent in the interest on the general mortgage bonds, an assessment of 8 dols. per share on the preferred and common stocks, such assessment to be represented by new first preference stock, and that the collateral trust bonds and the floating debt shall be extinguished out of the proposed assessment and by new first preference stock. A meeting of bondholders will be called in due course to consider this proposed arrangement.

From the annual report of the directors of the London Road-Car Company, it appears that a considerable improvement has attended the working of the undertaking during the past year, the heavy losses of previous years having ceased, and a profit having been made in lieu thereof. An extraordinary meeting is to be held, at which it will be proposed to write off the capital not represented by assets as well as the loss for 1883, in order that future profits may be distributed in the form of dividend. T. S.

In London last week 2913 births and 1525 deaths were registered, the former having been 29, and the latter 480, below the average numbers.

The Home Secretary has accepted the resignation of Lord Deas, one of the Judges of the Court of Session in Scotland, and has acknowledged the admirable manner in which he discharged his duties.

A meeting of Scottish Peers was held at Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh, on Tuesday, for the purpose of electing two Scottish representative Peers to sit in the House of Lords in the room of the late Earl of Morton and the late Earl of Dundonald. The Earl of Northesk received 41, and the Earl of Orkney 39 votes, and were elected.

The Trustees of the Peabody Fund announce that when the buildings in course of erection are completed they will have spent the whole of their capital. Up to the end of last year, they had provided for the artisan and labouring poor of London ten thousand one hundred and forty-four rooms, occupied by 18,453 persons.

At a meeting of the Statistical Society, held on Tuesday evening, Sir Richard Temple read a paper on "Population Statistics of China," in the course of which he said the population of China had from its vastness long been among the marvels of the civilised world. The official numbers had, within the last century and a half, ranged from 436,000,000 to 363,000,000; but the number last published in China, setting the population at 350,000,000, was much more moderate and apparently far more credible than the foregoing estimates.

Sir E. Y. W. Henderson has received a communication from Mr. Gladstone announcing that £50 each is to be paid from the Royal Bounty Fund to Constables Cox and Cole. Sir W. V. Harcourt has directed that Cole, who has received from the Queen the Albert Medal, shall receive £120, and Cox £70. Each will also receive £30 from the Bow-street reward fund, and they are to receive also money testimonials from the members of both Houses. It is believed that this subscription will amount to £500.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.

The last Session of the present Parliament, opened with the Lords v. Commons dispute fresh in the public mind on the Twenty-third of October, was resumed on Thursday under circumstances most discouraging for the Administration. The Egyptian darkness which has so long cast a black shadow over this country had been intensified by the gloomy news from Khartoum, General Gordon's heroic defence of which had, according to the differently told story of many messengers, closed with the volley which sealed his fate.

This sad story coloured all the speeches made from the platform Parliament on the eve of the return of legislators to St. Stephen's. Some of these utterances still deserve passing notice. Notwithstanding the clatter of tongues at Westminster, it is yet worth while referring, for the home-truths it tells the Government, to Mr. Joseph Cowen's roughly-eloquent distribe on Saturday at Newcastle-on-Tyne, where he roundly charged the Ministry with having been directly or indirectly instrumental in slaying twenty thousand persons and squandering over twenty millions sterling since the forts of Alexandria were bombarded by the British fleet. Similarly, Lord George Hamilton, on Monday, smote the Administration hip and thigh, and stoutly declared it would be the duty of the Conservative Party to move a vote of censure. It is also worthy of note that the Marquis of Ripon, following up the statesman-like speeches delivered by him since his return from India, on Tuesday gave the Liverpool Reform Club the benefit of his opinion on the Egyptian and Soudan difficulties. The late Viceroy of India distinctly approved the Government policy of non-annexation. In the same strain, naturally, spoke Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in appealing the same night to a Clapham audience to support the Ministry at this crisis.

The Government, amid their host of troubles, may be congratulated upon the accession to the Cabinet of the Earl of Rosebery as Lord Privy Seal and First Commissioner of Works, and of Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, the Postmaster-General. Both the noble Earl and the right hon. gentleman have distinguished themselves by their ability and earnestness in dealing with public affairs.

NOVELS.

Constructive power and the gift of arousing interest are not vouchsafed to all writers, as Cassandra: by Mrs. George Corbett (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.) will testify; and yet the writers who have not that power and that gift may—as this novel again will testify—fill three unusually large volumes with what is very readable at times, and indicative, moreover, of a certain bent towards story-telling, as well as of innate intellectual and moral superiority. The novel, it must be regretfully but candidly stated, is commonplace and devoid of substance; and little as there is of story proper, it runs a risk of suffering, from what is merely episodical, the fate which the waiter predicted for the milk ordered by Mr. Squeers to be freely diluted with water: "Why, the milk 'll be drownded!" said the horrified waiter. So it is with this story; it is "drownded" in a flux of irrelevant or only remotely relevant interpolations. The story is not strong enough in itself to admit of such treatment. One great mistake the author has made is to give undue prominence to a personage who is a sort of mixture made up from the worst characteristics of a Micawber, a Mantalini, and a Noah Claypole—so utterly and incredibly sordid, selfish, cruel, and contemptible, that the reader soon gets sick and weary of him, and turns the pages in positive dread of coming across his filthy trail; for there is about him none of that fascination which is sometimes exercised over us by the most atrocious villains. This, of course, is a great drawback, so far as the attractiveness of the book is concerned; nevertheless, it is one to which the cleverest writers, in their anxiety to exhibit their cleverness in portraiture, seem to shut their eyes deliberately. The title might lead to a belief that the tale which is told has for its heroine a young lady, whose prophetic soul is continually impelling her to utter perfectly sound predictions, to which, however, nobody will give heed, so that terrible consequences and useless remorse are the natural results. But there is nothing of the kind. In the opening scene a dying mother exacts of her only daughter, named Cassandra, and of a faithful old servant, named Martha, a mysterious oath. They swear to keep something secret; but the exact nature of their oath it would be difficult to depone, even after a perusal of all the three volumes. It soon appears, however, that there is a very silly last will and testament at the bottom of the mystery: Cassandra and her brother (who is undergoing an unjust, but equally unpleasant, sentence for forgery) are to lose their inheritance unless she (for it comes to that) sleeps every night for a certain period in a certain house, and, to make things more sure, she has apparently sworn not to so much as leave her room during that period. It is, fortunately, a short period; and, by the time it is over, a plot that has been formed for depriving the brother and sister of their inheritance has been entirely exploded. The story, then, to all intents and purposes, is over; but it proceeds all the same, and, according to the method of procedure, there seems to be no reason why it should not go on for ever, but that there is a prejudice against exceeding three volumes.

Exceedingly painful stories, like Madam: by Mrs. Oliphant (Longmans and Co.), should, at least, be so handled as to engross the attention and enlist the sympathy of the reader. It is to be feared, however, that, in spite of mystery and of melodramatic as well as really impressive and pathetic scenes, not many readers will sympathise with the lady who is the titular heroine of "Madam," or will be induced to forget the diffuseness of the narrative by contemplation of her angelic nature, her grievous wrongs, her terrible sufferings, her saint-like patience. The plot, slight as it is, is hardly consistent with the character of the heroine, and the business is conducted in a manner so unpractical as to be quite preposterous. Very unpleasant, too, is the original incident out of which the whole history is evolved. That a mother, who is anything better than the vilest of her sex, should consent, even under pressure of the direst poverty, to abandon her child as the sole condition on which she can obtain a wealthy husband, a position in the world, and all the luxuries of life, is more than a reader should be called upon to believe, and is far too shocking a proposition for acceptance; and, on the other hand, no gentleman, however selfish and heartless, would for his very pride's sake, dream of suggesting such a thing without making ample provision for the abandoned child. And it is not insinuated in the present instance that the gentleman, with all his despicable qualities, was either blind to what the conventional rules of conduct would require of him, or too miserly in his habits to part with money to promote his own purposes. It is too ridiculous, again, to find such a mother, when she is rejected by her own children, assuming the airs of a patient, resigned, repentant sinner, acknowledging the justice of the punishment inflicted upon her, because, as it would seem, she broke the infamous vow she had made, the vow that she would never see her child again, and not because she was wicked enough to make such a vow at all. It is true that she does admit the heinousness of her unmotherly behaviour, but she certainly appears to attribute the justice of the fate that befalls her to the breakage of her promise rather than to anything else. Nor does her behaviour, in consequence of her husband's absurd will, commend itself to one's notions either of common-sense or of probability: there was not the slightest occasion for her to disappear as she does, nor is it at all likely that anybody, not a lunatic, would have done so. A woman sufficiently cool and calculating, under such circumstances, to see that she really must accept the liberal provision made for her in the very will that robs her of her children and covers her with contempt, would have been practical enough to know that she might take two or three days to prepare for the separation to which she was doomed, and would certainly have taken them. The perfect love and confidence between the step-mother and step-daughter are very delightful to contemplate, and give occasion for some very pretty scenes: unfortunately, the causes of that love and confidence, which it would have been most interesting to study, are just what the novelist has not thought proper to reveal, or, at any rate, to let the reader see at work. With all its power, in fact, and with its succession of striking scenes, there is a sort of false bottom to the novel, which leaves on the mind a sense of hollowness and artificiality.

Passionate, picturesque, and very well written, though wild to a degree, more than slightly melodramatic, somewhat rhapsodical, and not a little painful as well as pathetic, is the romantic story of Tarantella: by Mathilde Blind (J. Fisher Unwin), which, both in matter and manner, in the business, and sometimes in the language, seems to belong to the domain of foreign literature, though there is no other ground for supposing that it is anything but a genuine English story, so far as the language in which it was written is concerned. Not a hint is dropped of translation; and, if indeed it were a translation, it would be a masterpiece of translator's work. However, the scenes and the characters are not English; and the colouring is partly German, partly Italian, partly French, "shot" with Russian. How a lovely girl is bitten by a tarantula, for which, as everybody does not know, there is no cure but such music as will make the victim dance involuntarily for an incredible length of time until the mortality of the wound has been danced completely away; how a wonderful musician is found to improvise such music on a certain night amid certain ancient ruins, with a troop of pretty girls looking on and joining from time to time in the dance, whilst awful thunder peals and zigzag lightning gleams around them; how the wonderful musician and the tarantulated maiden conceive for one another in due time a white-hot passion, and are eventually put through the ceremony of marriage: how, in an evil hour, the beautiful girl runs away with a Russian nobleman, not for his "beaux yeux," but for his money and position; how she has no hesitation in treating the Russian nobleman as her bank only, and the musician, when at last he comes up with her in his character of avenger and possible shedder of blood, as her real husband and true love; how the musician yields to her blandishments, but again, in a moment of revulsion, aghast at his own shame and her shamelessness, quits her, as he thinks, for ever; how he falls in love with a charming girl, how he discovers that he was never really married to the heroine of the tarantula; how this girl and that heroine become acquaintances and intimate friends, and how a fearful tragedy, a sad catastrophe, results—all this and more is to be learned from the two volumes of the romance, which nobody who takes it up to read is likely to lay aside without an effort until it is completely finished.

At the sale by auction of the remaining portion of the world-renowned Lord Wilton herd of Hereford cattle at Stocktonbury, near Leominster, the property of the executors of T. J. Carwardine, the celebrated bull Lord Wilton, which in August fell under the hammer for 3890 guineas, was sold for 1000 guineas. Several other animals were sold at sums much under those realised in August.

The court of the Fishmongers' Company have resolved to dispose of their Irish estates forthwith. The City Press says the company will offer them, in the first place, to their tenants, either for immediate purchase or one spread over a period of years to suit their respective requirements, upon terms which cannot but be considered as liberal. There are nearly four hundred tenants, upon short terms, the majority of whom have holdings of less than £20, and the rent-roll amounts to about £9000 per annum.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: MAKING CLOTHING AT PIMLICO FOR THE TROOPS GOING TO SOUAKIM.

THE JAPANESE VILLAGE.

The experiment of transporting a complete village with its shops, tea-house, theatre, and place of worship, as well as their inhabitants, from warm, sunny Japan to murky London, during the coldest and dullest months of the year, has been a very bold, but an entirely successful one. The almond-eyed artisans are encamped in Humphrey's Hall, Knightsbridge, and look most wonderfully at home there. The planks for their shops, the platforms on which they sit, or rather squat, and the low desks, or tables, at which they work, have all been brought over bodily; and if only the sunshine, the blue sky, and the tropical foliage could have been added, the picture of Japanese life would have been perfect. As it is, the men and women evidently enjoy the joke immensely, glance up at their visitors with quick bright eyes, make remarks about them to one another in their strange, but not unmusical, tongue, and go on with their work in the unhasting yet unresting manner which so eminently distinguishes the oriental from the western races. Their long brown hands do not look over clean, and they hold their tools in what seems to us an unhandy fashion, but the effects they produce are true and neat and exquisitely finished. Plenty of gas-jets are lit for their benefit, but they depend chiefly for light on the short wax or composite candles, which they affix firmly, by means of a few drops of their own grease, to little round tin trays, which stand as close as possible to their hands and never seem to be upset or to drip about, or in anywise behave themselves like ordinary candles in common use among us. The Japs tuck their feet up under them in the most comfortable fashion; a remarkably pretty woman, with a complexion of roses and lilies and a sweet happy expression of face, flits about from stall to stall, inquiring how her compatriots fare in their new quarters; a couple of tiny children, with an unmistakably English nurse, toddle about in their warm long-sleeved blue frocks; and a sound of barbaric, but not discordant, music comes in single notes from the annexe, where a vocal and instrumental performance is going on.

A PLACE OF WORSHIP.

Our Artist has made Sketches in the tea-house, where the cup that cheers is handed to you by a damsel who half hides her laughing face with her loose sleeve, suggesting to the philological mind the origin of the familiar expression, "to laugh in your sleeve"; and, again, at the umbrella-maker's shop, where the bamboo framework rests on a sort of easel while the maker turns it round, covers it with paper, and paints the surface with grotesque figures. Further on there is a tray and cabinet maker; and in a recess between two shops there is something like a temple, or at all events an inclosure devoted to a hideous idol, before which two lanterns burn continually. The stick carver cuts away diligently with his sharp knife, and the screen painter uses his colours from uncouth looking little bowls. Here is a letter writer, perpetually inscribing a few words on a morsel of paper, to the great delight of the beholders, and there is a potter, with a large jar, the surface of which he is diligently filling up with flowers, butterflies, and scroll-work in cloisonné enamel. There is no more curious sight than the embroidery on satin stretched in a frame. The flowers look bright and glossy, though the silk has been perpetually rolled up and down in the brown hands, a burnt candle end is thrown away and another set up, yet the fingers appear unsoiled, and the pattern grows apace till a large showy piece of work is finished. The single-stick and theatrical performances attract large numbers of spectators, but the most abiding interest seems to be that taken in the shops and artisans.

Mr. Martin Harvey, of Hexworthy, near Launceston, has presented Penzance with a new life-boat and house, at a cost of £1000.

THE COURT.

The Queen has been suffering from a cold, which has assumed a slight bronchial character. Some anxiety having been caused by the reports of her Majesty's indisposition, we are happy to state that there is not the least ground for any national disquietude. By the advice of Sir William Jenner, her Majesty postponed her departure from Osborne for a few days. It has been officially stated that the cold has greatly abated. The Duchess of Albany, who was to have spent her birthday (Tuesday) with the Queen at Windsor, went to pass it instead with her Majesty at Osborne. It is announced that while rejoicing at the gallantry displayed by the troops in storming the enemy's position near Dulka Island, her Majesty the Queen deeply laments the loss of Major-General Earle and of the other officers and men who fell in the engagement.

The Prince of Wales left Cannes on Monday morning for Nice, where he visited the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and lunched at the Hôtel de Luxembourg. In the afternoon he took part in the Battle of Flowers, driving with the Princess of Saxe-Meiningen, Madame De Gallifet, and Comte St. Priest. The procession was nearly five miles long, and comprised more than nine hundred carriages. The Prince left Cannes on Tuesday on his return to England. The Princess of Wales, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor and Prince George, and by Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, and attended by Miss Knollys and Lieutenant-General Sir Dighton Probyn, were present at Divine service at Sandringham church on Sunday morning, when the Rev. F. A. G. Hervey, M.A., Domestic Chaplain to the Prince of Wales, officiated. Prince Albert Victor returned to Trinity College, Cambridge, in the evening, and Prince George to Greenwich. The Princess, accompanied by Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, left Sandringham on Monday for London.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

There was a very large congregation at St. Peter's, Eaton-square, on Tuesday morning to witness the marriage of the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos with Miss Graham-Montgomery, eldest daughter of Sir G. and Lady Graham-Montgomery, whose sister is married to Mr. Gore Langton, M.P., a nephew of the Duke. The chancel was decorated with choice white flowers, and the service was choral, the choir preceding the bride up the nave to the chancel step. The officiating clergy were the Dean of Edinburgh, the Rev. C. Graham-Montgomery, brother of the bride, and the Rev. J. Storrs, the Vicar. The bride, who was given away by her father, wore a dress of the richest white satin, the petticoat being of artistic gold embroidery on lace, trimmed with fine old point de Flandres and real orange-blossoms, and a veil of fine old point, fastened by a sprig of diamond lilies, the gift of her mother, a pearl necklace and diamond brooch and a diamond and ruby bracelet, presented by the town of Buckingham and the tenants on the Duke's estates. The bridesmaids were Miss Evelyn Graham-Montgomery (sister of the bride), Lady Caroline Grenville, the Hon. Florence Murray, the Hon. Emily Murray, Miss Gore Langton, Miss Clara Gore Langton, Miss Harvey, and Miss Rachel Erskine. They wore very becoming costumes of white satin brocade and lace, with blue velvet hats with shaded wings, and brooches of dark-blue enamel with pearls, and monograms in diamonds, while they carried bouquets of lilies of the valley. The best man was Mr. Grenville Gore Langton. The breakfast was at Lady Graham-Montgomery's, in Grosvenor-place. The presents were very numerous.

In the parish church of St. Mary Abbott, Kensington, on Tuesday afternoon, was solemnised, by special license, the marriage of Viscount Lymington, M.P., and Beatrice Mary, only child of the late Mr. Edward Pease, of Greencroft Hall, Darlington, and Summer Manor, Bewdley, and niece of Sir Joseph Whitworth Pease, Bart., M.P. The bridegroom was accompanied by his brother, the Hon. Gerard Wallop, as best man. The bridesmaids were Lady Margaret and Lady Henrietta Wallop, sisters; Lady Winifred Herbert, cousin of the bridegroom; Miss Blanche and Miss Ethel Pease, and Miss Player, cousins of the bride. The bride, on her arrival, was received by her uncle, by whom she was afterwards given away. The officiating clergy were the Rev. Canon Liddon, the Rev. Canon Creighton, the Hon. and Rev. E. Carr-Glyn (the Vicar), and the Rev. H. John Fellowes, Rector of Over Wallop, Hants. The service was choral. After the solemnisation, the wedding party went to 24, Kensington Palace-gardens, where Sir Joseph and Lady Pease held a reception. Later in the afternoon, Viscount Lymington and his bride left for Hurstbourne Park, one of Lord Portsmouth's seats in Hants, where they will pass the early days of their honeymoon, they having made arrangements to leave at an early day for Australia, on a visit to his Lordship's brother.

A large and fashionable congregation assembled at St. Peter's Church, Eaton-square, on Tuesday afternoon, for the marriage of Captain Robert G. Wardlaw-Ramsay, of Whitehill and Tillycoultry, Midlothian, and Mary Alice, elder daughter of the late Mr. Charles Swinton Hogg, and niece of Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, Bart., M.P. The marriage (by special license) was fixed for two o'clock. Mr. R. Hart Dyke was the best man. The bridesmaids were Miss Violet Hogg, sister of the bride; Miss Wardlaw-Ramsay and Miss Alice Wardlaw-Ramsay, sisters of the bridegroom; Miss Lucy Hogg, Miss Stapleton, Miss Byng, Miss Evelyn Stirling, and Lady Marjorie Gordon, cousins of the bride; Miss Susan Portman, and Miss Hopwood. The bride was received, on alighting at the church portico, by Sir James M'Garel Hogg, Bart., her uncle, who conducted her to the chancel. The Rev. H. W. Webb Peploe, Vicar of St. Paul's, Onslow-square, officiated; the bride being given away by her mother. The service was fully choral. Later in the afternoon, Captain and Mrs. Wardlaw-Ramsay left for Cornwall.

The marriage of Mr. Arthur Gordon, younger, of Ellon Castle, Aberdeenshire, and Caroline, second daughter of General the Hon. Sir Alexander Hamilton-Gordon, M.P., took place last Saturday morning, in the parish church of St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington. Mr. Victor Williamson was the bridegroom's best man; and the bridesmaids were Misses Louisa and Kathleen Hamilton-Gordon, sisters of the bride, Miss Hardcastle and Miss Katherine H. Gordon, her cousins, and Miss Mary Marshall, a niece. They wore dresses composed of azalea pink nun's cloth, trimmed with pale coffee-coloured lace, and small straw bonnets with azalea-blossom and brown leaves. Each wore a double ivy-leaf (the Gordon badge) gold pin, and carried a bouquet of pink azaleas and brown ivy-leaves. The bride wore a dress of cream poult de soie, the front being covered with Brussels lace flounces; a wreath of natural myrtle, and a tulle veil attached to the hair by a diamond spray, one of the bridegroom's presents; and carried a beautiful bouquet of white azaleas and ivy. The officiating clergy were the Hon. and Rev. Douglas Hamilton-Gordon, M.A., Canon of Salisbury, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, uncle of the bride; assisted by the Hon. and Rev. Edward Carr Glyn, M.A., Vicar of Kensington, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen. Sir Alexander gave his daughter away.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland paid a visit to Lord Powerscourt at his residence near Bray last Saturday. While he was riding in the vicinity, his horse swerved and threw him. His shoulder sustained a bruise, but his Excellency was able to attend Divine service at the Chapel Royal.

At Messrs. Mathieson's chemical works, Widnes, last Saturday, George Roberts, a labourer, fell backwards into a cistern containing muriatic acid, which was acting upon chemical waste and giving off volumes of highly poisonous gas. Mr. T. Mathieson, the son of the proprietor of the works, was quickly on the spot, and without the slightest hesitation jumped into the cistern and rescued the labourer from his perilous position. The man, however, died from his injuries on Monday, and Mr. Mathieson almost fell a victim, the poisonous fumes having penetrated into his system to such an extent that he is now in a very critical condition.

THE "WONDER."
The "Daily News" of May 1, 1884, says: "There are few innocent pleasures greater than yachting or coaching. In driving out of London with a good team and in pleasant company, there is that exhilaration of rapid motion which is never realised on a steam-boat, and only in a dull mechanical way on a railway. In mid-spring and summer, the traveller by coach has advantages few others can command. In railway cars or post-chaise one is too low down to enjoy the landscape, and the pedestrian must climb up somewhere to get a view of the surrounding country, but the coaching man has no such disadvantage."

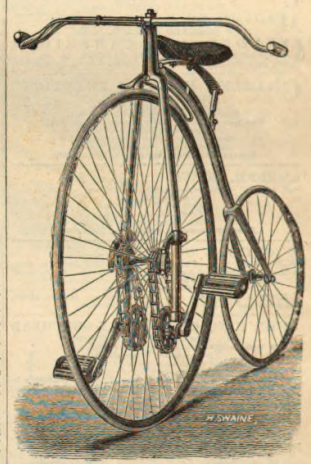
The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke; being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants, it is perfectly delicious to the taste, and as harmless as sherry. DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood stated publicly in Court that Dr. J. Collis Browne was undoubtedly the inventor of Chlorodyne; that the whole story of the defendant Freeman was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See the "Times," July 13, 1864.



DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—The Right Hon. Earl Russell communicated to the College of Physicians and J. T. Davenport that he had received information to the effect that the only remedy of any service in cholera was Chlorodyne.—See "Lancet," Dec. 31, 1853.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Extract from the "Medical Times," Jan. 12, 1856:—"Is prescribed by scores of orthodox practitioners. Of course, it would not be thus singularly popular did it not supply a want and fill a place."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is the best and most certain remedy in Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Consumption, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, &c.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE is a certain cure in Cholera, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, &c.

ANGLING.

If Clare was foolish enough to have been jealous of Lady St. Austell, on account of what she considered the flirtation that had taken place between that frivolous lady and Adrian, she was at least not so unjust as to impute any blame to the latter. Following the custom of her sex, she blamed the woman, and felt no anger against her lover for having caused her to pass some unhappy hours. But indeed she blamed nobody very long; nor was it possible that she should entertain any serious misgivings as to Adrian's constancy. He, for his part, was far too deeply in love to waste many thoughts upon Lady St. Austell. He made no reference to her on the following day, and, before twenty-four hours were over, she and her projected visit to Polruth had passed entirely out of his mind.

It so chanced, however, that Lady St. Austell had not forgotten Mr. Vidal. She had taken a fancy to the young author, partly because she had made up her mind beforehand to like him, partly because he was handsome, and partly also because he was neither in love with her nor likely to become so. She had filled her house with a set of people who bored her, and she complained bitterly to Heriot that she didn't know how to get through the day.

"Very seldom before have I felt so dejected," she said. "I have an idea that it might do me some good to drive over to Cardrew and see your friend Mr. Vidal. You shall come with me and keep the Irvine family engaged in conversation while I take him out for a walk. Would you mind?"

"Not in the least," answered Heriot: "but it seems just possible that Miss Irvine might mind, and I am not sure that Vidal himself would enjoy the walk as much as he ought to do. Hadn't you better wait until he is married? You will find him much more diverting company then."

"But I want to be diverted now," objected Lady St. Austell. "His wedding won't take place before next Wednesday, I presume, and on that day, I am thankful to say, we go to Scotland. If you really think the girl would be so absurd as to dislike my taking her fiancé out for a walk, I won't do it. Or she can accompany us, if she chooses. My own belief is that they will all be rather annoyed if I don't pay them a visit; because I promised that I would, and you know how huffy people who live in remote places always are when one breaks an engagement."

"I would undertake to make your peace with them," said Heriot, drily.

"Well; the fact is that I have just sent a note to Mrs. Irvine, asking her if she will have me to luncheon to-morrow. I told her I should bring you with me; so I am afraid we can't get out of it now."

Heriot smiled. He had noticed Clare Irvine's face on the night of the dinner party, and had been sorry for what he had seen there. It was easy enough to forecast the future of such a woman; easy enough to guess what inevitable troubles must be in store for her; and impossible—at least to this old and faithful friend—not to deplore them in advance. But Lady St. Austell was scarcely a person to be dreaded. Vidal was not in her world, and her memory of the absent was not very retentive. Moreover, she was certain to have picked up some unattached admirer before she could meet him again.

It was, therefore, with tolerable equanimity, though without much hope of spending a pleasant day, that Heriot heard, on the morrow, of the receipt of a favourable reply from Mrs. Irvine, and seated himself beside his hostess in the mail-phaeton which was to convey them to Cardrew. Lady St. Austell, who drove as fast as she talked—which is saying a good deal—accomplished the distance in excellent time, and took the whole burden of the conversation upon herself. When the slate roofs and the pale blue smoke-wreaths of Polruth came in sight, she declared that she already felt better.

"It is the atmosphere of Blaise that weighs me down so," said she. "Everybody is dull there—even you, if you will excuse my saying so. I observe that you are much more cheerful when you are with the Irvines than you are with us. They shall cheer you up this afternoon, and if only Mr. Vidal can manage to do as much for me, I shall be eternally grateful to him."

But perhaps Mr. Vidal was not anxious to possess that claim upon Lady St. Austell's gratitude; for hardly had Mrs. Irvine finished welcoming her guests when she made an announcement regarding him which amused one of them a good deal more than it did the other.

"Two of our party have deserted us," the unsuspecting lady said. "Clare and Adrian—Mr. Vidal, you know. Well, of course that is very natural, and one is glad that they should enjoy themselves together—especially as the boys tease them so whenever they are within reach. To-day they have taken their lunch with them, and I believe they are going to fish the trout-stream up from the sea; though whether they will catch anything is another matter. But I dare say they won't mind, and Adrian said he was sure they wouldn't be missed."

Heriot chuckled in his beard; but if he expected Lady St. Austell to exhibit any signs of mortification, he was disappointed. Lady St. Austell had her countenance well under command, and was also a woman of considerable readiness.

"Mr. Vidal is too modest," she answered. "I shall miss both him and your daughter very much; but I don't mean to go away without seeing them. I have never caught a trout in my life, and I adore new sensations. Mr. Irvine," she added, bringing an engaging smile to bear upon Jack, "will you be good-natured enough to take charge of an ignorant woman this afternoon, and show her how to throw a fly? Then we might all walk up the stream together."

"With the greatest pleasure, Lady St. Austell," answered Jack; "only you can't throw a fly into that stream, because it is so overgrown. However, if you will condescend to a grub, I'll do my best to show you some sport. It's rather rough walking, though; I don't know whether you mind that."

Lady St. Austell declared, quite truthfully, that she minded nothing that gave her amusement, and added, with a shade less of truth, that she felt sure of having that, since Mr. Irvine had so kindly consented to be troubled with her.

This speech put Jack, who was not much accustomed to be sought after by fascinating countesses, upon excellent terms with himself, and caused him inwardly to resolve that Lady St. Austell should have the use of his own rod, instead of Bob's, which, in view of probable contingencies, he had originally destined for her. During luncheon, he talked a good deal and flattered himself that he displayed all the graceful ease of a man of the world, while the lady for whose sake this brilliancy of dialogue was being displayed listened with every appearance of interest.

Whatever may have been the impression that Jack produced upon her, it is certain that she produced a most favourable one, not only upon him, but upon all the other members of his family. No one could have been more agreeable; and she found an opportunity of saying something pleasant to everybody—having, indeed, long ago discovered that it is scarcely more difficult, and a great deal wiser, to make friends than enemies.

No sooner was she out of the dining-room than she expressed her intention of proceeding to the stream forthwith. "No, my dear Mrs. Irvine, you must not think of coming with me in this heat. I couldn't hear of such a thing—it would make me quite miserable! No; you shall sit here quietly and talk to Mr. Heriot, who, I know, has heaps of things to say to you; and Mr. Jack—may I call you Mr. Jack? It saves confusion, doesn't it?—Mr. Jack will look after me."

So presently, this resolute lady, who was appropriately equipped for fishing in a pair of the thinnest French boots and a charming costume of pale pink cambric, trimmed with yards of lace, was seen tripping across the slopes of the park with her chosen protector by her side, and Heriot, watching them from the window, burst into an abrupt laugh, which he declined to explain when called upon to do so.

In the meantime, Adrian and Clare were having a perfectly happy time of it together. They were not catching many fish, it is true; but then it had not been for the sake of catching fish that they had absented themselves. When Lady St. Austell's note had arrived, Clare had, indeed, exclaimed, "Oh, what a bore! Now we shall not be able to try the trout-stream;" but she had been rather surprised by the promptitude with which Vidal had returned, "Why not? It would be a capital excuse for getting out of her way, and we aren't bound to receive your mother's guests." She had not supposed that he would have been anxious to get out of Lady St. Austell's way; but in truth he would, at that time, have been anxious to get out of the way of anybody who had threatened to deprive him for a few hours of the only society for which he cared. So these two went off together in the best of spirits, and, starting from the sea, progressed slowly upwards, conscientiously fishing every pool, and only allowing themselves a respite of perhaps an hour and a half in which to consume the sandwiches that they had carried out with them.

The stream—which dropped in a succession of tiny cascades and miniature rapids from the heights of Cardrew to the shore—was of tolerably respectable volume when swelled by the winter rains, but after so dry a summer as this had been, was reduced to the dimensions of a mere rivulet. To an enthusiastic angler, therefore, it would have seemed to leave much to be desired; but, on the other hand, a pair of lovers might very well be content to clamber up its mossy banks, to rest awhile under the thick shade of the trees which bordered it, or to seat themselves upon one of the overhanging boulders beneath which the little trout congregated. Adrian and Clare hooked three of these, and threw them back again to grow larger; but as the afternoon went on, they got no more bites, and agreed at last that it was absurd to expect any fish to look at a grub in such bright weather.

This point being decided, they felt entitled to take their rods to pieces and enjoy themselves after a less laborious fashion. Sitting under the overarching boughs, through which stray shafts of sunlight flickered, sometimes interchanging remarks which it would be cruel to transfer to the hard black and white of a printed page, and sometimes listening in contented silence to the babble of the brook and to all those subdued stirrings and rustlings which make the charm of the woods in summer-time, they were wholly oblivious of the existence of Lady St. Austell, who was nevertheless drawing nearer to them every moment, and brushing her way through the undergrowth with a recklessness that might have brought a sardonic smile to the lips of her dressmaker.

Her ladyship very soon had enough of Jack, and paid no heed to his entreaties that she would remain among the higher pools and spare herself so much needless exertion. "If we go on much farther we shall come upon those two idiots," he said, discontentedly, "and then it will be all up with our chance. They are sure to have gone splashing about and scaring the fish, and, besides, there's no use in trying places that have been tried all day."

But Lady St. Austell, though good-humoured, was inexorable. "'Sometimes the least likeliest places is more likelier than the most likeliest,'" said she, quoting from an old number of Punch. "We will go on till we find the two idiots, as you politely call them, and then we can begin to retrace our steps."

And find them she did. She found them, indeed, so suddenly that they started a couple of yards apart with great haste, and looked exceedingly red and foolish. The little lady in the pink dress, who stood smiling down upon them, with her rod in her hand, was not at all put out of countenance.

"See how indiscreet I am!" she cried. "Your brother has been imploring me not to thrust my company upon you; but I delight in doing the things that I ought not to do, and I really think you both deserve some punishment for running away from me after promising to show me all the beauties of Polruth. Mr. Vidal, I am glad to see that you look ashamed of yourself. Never mind! I know you are a privileged person just now. I only wanted to demonstrate to you that you can't escape me by concealing yourself in a thicket, and having done that, I will take myself off."

But, of course, Lady St. Austell could not be allowed to depart in this way. The delinquents made such apologies as seemed necessary, and one of them was more eager to clear himself of the charge of having run away than perhaps he need have been. It is always disagreeable to be caught with your arm round a lady's waist. However beautiful and refined that lady may happen to be, and however legitimate may be the attitude, there is an apparent vulgarity about it which is both distressing and humiliating. Vidal thought he had better try to efface the recollection of what she had seen from the intruder's mind; and it was with this pardonable object that he set to work to divert Lady St. Austell, and presently offered to show her a spot whence she might drop her line with some prospect of success. It was not at all his intention to walk away with her, and leave Clare and Jack behind; yet that was the result of his unfortunate proposition, which was at once accepted.

"I told Mrs. Irvine that I was going to catch trout," Lady St. Austell remarked, "and I suppose it is my duty to catch one, if I can. I haven't the most distant idea of how to set about it; but I will try to be a docile pupil."

It took Vidal some five minutes to conduct his pupil to her post and to bait her hook, and during these five minutes the two remaining members of the party thought fit to disappear. When Vidal noticed their absence, he began to wish that he had been a little less precipitate in offering his services; but he could not very well shout after them, and any regrets that may have been visible upon his face were at once banished thence by a remark of his companion's, who had been watching him with much amusement.

"I hope I haven't got you into a scrape," she said. "I really didn't mean to take you away from Miss Irvine. Will she be very angry with you?"

"Of course not," replied Vidal, who did not much like the question. "Why should she be?"

"Oh, there is no reason why she should be; but girls are apt to be exacting. Perhaps you think other people are rather exacting too, without so good an excuse. That is only too true, I am afraid; still, I don't see how I could have sat and talked to Mrs. Irvine all the afternoon. Please, overlook the offence for this once, and it shall not be repeated."

Vidal said what nobody could have helped saying in answer to such a speech, and said it in all sincerity. For choice, he would rather not have been interrupted; but, since the interruption had taken place, he did not mind it much. It was a flattering thought that Lady St. Austell should have torn an exquisite gown to shreds for the pleasure of seeing him; and one may find a woman very pleasant company without having the faintest disposition to flirt with her. Nor did she say a word to him that might not have been spoken in the presence of a dozen witnesses. Every now and again she threw him a languishing look; but that was only her way—she would have done the same thing, from mere force of habit, if she had been talking to her own grandfather—and all the time she kept dropping her line into the water with a splash that ought to have been enough to terrify any fish.

It has, however, been observed before now by many a patient angler, as well as by toilers in other fields, that people who know nothing at all of what they are about often meet with a success beyond their deserts; and so it proved in Lady St. Austell's case. All of a sudden some reckless denizen of the pool took it into his head to swallow the bait held out to him, and the consequence was what might have been anticipated.

"Good gracious!" she exclaimed, "I have caught a whale! What am I to do?"

The top joint of her rod was something less than a semicircle; the fish had dashed beneath a boulder, and a catastrophe appeared imminent. "Give him line!—give him line!" shouted Vidal, excitedly; "you've got a big one."

But, alas! she had not got him at all. Disregarding her instructions, she jerked her rod upwards, and immediately one half of her line was entangled in the branches overhead, while the remainder was secured as a permanent possession by the trout.

It is impossible for anyone to see a fellow-creature behave in that way without some passing feeling of indignation. "Why didn't you listen to me?" exclaimed Vidal, reproachfully. "Surely you couldn't have thought you were going to land a fish by main force!"

"I thought he was going to pull me into the water," answered Lady St. Austell, who was not at all disconcerted by her failure; "and I didn't wish to be put to such discomfort by a wretched little trout. How absurd it is of people to make fishing-tackle of such flimsy material! With a good stout pole and some strong twine I could have dragged him out easily. I'm sorry about the line. I suppose that poor youth will be very much annoyed and say it was all my fault, won't he?"

"Oh, that's nothing, answered Vidal; "I can put on another line for you in a minute or two. The sad thing is that you should have let a splendid opportunity slip."

Lady St. Austell laughed, not feeling the situation to be a sad one. She sat down, clasping her hands round her knees, and watched the young man while he produced line and gut from his pocket and began tying them with deft fingers. How handsome and well built he was! And how admirably his loose shooting-coat, knickerbockers, and deer-stalking cap became him! Lady St. Austell worshipped youth—she would have given all her jewels to be ten or fifteen years younger herself—and as she contemplated Clare Irvine's affianced husband, it occurred to her that it would be very pleasant to be Clare Irvine. To be young again; to be in love—really in love again; to be loved in return, and to believe that such things can endure! Oh, sweet dreams of bygone days! Oh, happy ignorance and innocence! Oh, buttercups and daisies! Lady St. Austell was so affected by the pathos of her thoughts that she sighed aloud, and Vidal, glancing up, asked her if she was tired.

"I am, rather," she replied; "I don't think I'll fish any more. Come and sit down here, and we will talk for a few minutes instead. Do you know that you ought to be a perfectly happy man?"

"I believe I am," said Vidal, with a slight laugh.

"I suppose so. I wish, for your sake, that you could go on being as happy all your life; only that sort of happiness can't last, unfortunately. I never can remember poetry; but I dare say you know the whole of that dismal little ditty about the impossibility of keeping love from dying in the knot there's no untying."

"I know the poem, but I am not bound to believe in the sentiment," answered Vidal, smiling.

"Ah, you must believe in it. You couldn't write as you do unless you had found out that much. Still, I grant you that some married couples are happy, after a fashion. They must not see too much of one another; that is the chief thing. What is this nonsense Mr. Heriot tells me about your taking a house down in the wilds of Cornwall? Be advised by me, and don't attempt impossibilities. London is the only place for you to live in, and you know that as well as I do."

"It isn't exactly a matter of choice. We have to consider ways and means"——

"Rubbish!" interrupted Lady St. Austell. "You can live as cheaply in London as anywhere, if you don't insist upon settling in a fashionable quarter. Take a pretty little house in Brompton or Bayswater, and when we come up in the spring, you must bring your wife to see me, and I will introduce her to some nice people and try to make things cheery for her."

"You are very kind," said Vidal.

"I really am—to people whom I like," returned Lady St. Austell, naively; "I have been often told so. What distresses me is that I am not always allowed to see as much of my friends as I could wish."

This statement led her to speak of her own conjugal relations, which she did with the utmost frankness and good humour, to her hearer's great amusement. Vidal was told all about Johnny Spencer, and also about many of Johnny's predecessors; his informant did not attempt to disguise either her own fickleness or that of her admirers, and interspersed her narrative with such quaint reflections that he shook from head to foot with suppressed laughter, until she noticed his merriment and begged him not to suppress it any longer. "It is so much better to laugh than to cry, and so much better to do either than to be bored," she said.

Whatever Lady St. Austell might be, she was certainly not a bore. Vidal was so much tickled by her observations that he did not notice how late it was getting; and it was she who concluded the interview by exclaiming suddenly that she had not a minute to lose. "I have enjoyed my day very much," she was so kind as to say; "and I am convinced that you and I should become great friends if we saw more of each other. Now mind, you are to be sure to call upon me when we come to London; otherwise I may have forgotten about you by that time. You won't think me rude for saying so; but one meets such a number of people, and I have no memory. So do look me up—you needn't bring your wife the first time, if she chooses to stand upon ceremony—and you will be most welcome."

She repeated this amicable invitation by-and-by in the drawing-room, where Clare was sitting with the rest of the family. "I have been telling Mr. Vidal that I hope to see you both in London next spring; and if you will treat me like an old friend and neighbour, and call upon me without waiting for a formal first visit, I shall think it so kind of you."

"Thank you, very much," answered Clare, rather coldly; "but we are not at all likely to be in London next spring."

"Oh, yes, you are," returned Lady St. Austell; "you are not at all likely to be anywhere else. You can't live in the country all the year round. Mr. Vidal owes it to his readers to study society, and we owe it to ourselves to make society pleasant for him."

She nodded amiably, and went round the room, making her adieux: she was in too great a hurry to notice Clare's grave face and chilling manner. But after she and Heriot had driven away, somebody else was made unpleasantly aware of Miss Irvine's displeasure.

"Thanks; but I don't think I much care to hear about it," Clare said, when Vidal, in the innocence of his heart, proposed to relate to her all that had passed between him and their departed guest. She was standing just outside one of the open French windows, and she looked away as she spoke.

"She really was great fun," Vidal went on, a little doubtfully, being aware that Clare did not like Lady St. Austell, but suspecting no special reason for such dislike.

"Yes? I believe a good many people think so," remarked Clare, moving away; and there was that in her tone which made it absolutely necessary to follow her and ask whether anything was the matter.

"Nothing whatever," she replied, with her head in the air.

Vidal of course knew what that meant, and it vexed him more than it might have done an older man. That the woman whom you love should resent your disappearing into a wood for the best part of an hour with another woman is neither a very unnatural nor a very offensive thing; but to Vidal it seemed evidence of a distrust so absurd as to be positively alarming. If this was done in the green tree, what would be done in the dry?

"Clare," he said, gravely, after an interval of silence, during which they had been pacing side by side along the gravel walk, "you surely can't mean to quarrel with me because I was obliged to leave you for that little time."

"You were not obliged; you offered to go," she returned. "But I certainly do not mean to quarrel. Nobody has ever called me quarrelsome."

"You are angry, at any rate; and I must say I think that is rather unjust. I didn't intend to go off with Lady St. Austell; I hadn't the slightest wish to do anything of the sort—quite the contrary. But don't you see that we can't be always together, and that if we are to doubt one another whenever we are apart, there won't be much happiness for either of us?"

Poor Clare hardly knew what answer to make. She felt that, from the common-sense point of view, she was utterly in the wrong; she could not hope to make Vidal understand the danger of which her woman's instinct warned her; and yet she thought he might have been a little less peremptory. "I was not angry with you, Adrian," she said at length, quite humbly.

"But, my dearest girl, why should you be angry with anybody? You haven't a high opinion of Lady St. Austell—well, perhaps she doesn't deserve to be highly respected, although, so far as I can see, there is very little harm in her. But in any case, you may be sure that when she wishes to indulge in a flirtation, it isn't a person of my humble position in society that she selects. All that she did was to patronise me, and pay me a few compliments about my writing, and ask me to take you to call upon her in London. She meant to be good-natured—indeed, she was good-natured. She would be very much astonished if she knew that you and I had nearly fallen out because of her."

Clare bit her lips and looked down, without replying; and presently Vidal resumed: "Added to which, she is a fat old creature, with whom I hope I should never have had the bad taste to flirt under any circumstances."

Possibly, that assertion may have been more convincing than the most sensible of arguments. Clare stood still, hesitated a moment, and then, suddenly throwing her arms round Adrian's neck, burst into tears. "I am sorry," she sobbed out, with her head on his shoulder. "I ought not to have been so silly. It is my horrid jealous temper—and—and—I love you so! I can't help thinking that she does want to flirt with you; but what does it matter? We won't talk about her any more. You will forgive me, won't you, Adrian?"

So this lovers' quarrel ended as all lovers' quarrels ought to end; and if Vidal had been asked, the next day, whether it had left any disagreeable impression upon his mind, he would have answered, quite conscientiously, that it had not. Nevertheless, the conditions under which we work out our lives do not admit of obliterations. Every incident, however trivial, must needs have its consequences; it is easy to forgive, and easy also, in a certain sense, to forget; but perhaps it is hardly possible, with the best will in the world, to forget that one has forgiven.

By C. E. TUCKETT.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in three moves.

The following Game is quoted from the Adelaide Observer, because of the curious termination. It was played in the Intercolonial Match, by telegraph, between Mr. A. CHAMIER, for New South Wales, and Mr. ESLING, for Victoria.

(Ruy Lopez.)

WHITE (Mr. C.)	BLACK (Mr. E.)	WHITE (Mr. C.)	BLACK (Mr. E.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th	20. Q R to K sq	Q to Kt 2nd
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd	21. Q to Q 2nd	Q to R 3rd
3. B to Kt 5th	P to Q R 3rd	22. P takes P	P to B 5th
4. B to R 4th	Kt to K B 3rd	24. B takes P	B takes Kt
5. P to Q 3rd	P to Q 3rd	24. B takes B	R to B sq (ch)
6. P to B 3rd	B to Q 2nd	25. B to B 6th
7. B to K 3rd	P to K Kt 3rd
8. Q Kt to Q 2nd	B to Kt 2nd
9. Castles	K Kt to Kt 5th

There seems no purpose in this move, unless, as our contemporary observes, it is intended to be sacrificed.

10. Q to K 2nd	P to K B 4th
11. P takes B P	P takes P
12. P to K R 3rd	P to K R 4th
13. P takes Kt	R P takes P
14. Kt to Kt 5th	B to B 3rd
15. P to K B 4th	Q to K 2nd
16. K to B 2nd	Castles (Q R)
17. B takes Kt

We agree with the Adelaide Observer in thinking this move injudicious.

17.	B takes B
18. Kt to Q B 4th	R to R 7th
19. R to K Kt sq	R to K sq

At this point there occurred a misconception which seems to have been caused by a defect in the arrangements of the match. Mr. Esling's move as wired from Melbourne was 25. Q to B 8th, but it was read in Sydney as 25. Q to B 5th (ch), and the reply was 25. K to B sq. White consequently lost the game in a few moves. It is, perhaps, worth mentioning that in the only match by telegraph in which the writer engaged, he had his own and his adversary's moves repeated, and had such a precaution been adopted in this case, such a blunder could not have occurred. The following is the finish, which is neat enough on the part of Black:—

25.		Q to R 6th
26. K to B sq		B takes P (ch)
27. R takes B		R to R 8th (ch)
28. K to K 2nd		Q to B 6th

Checkmate.

We have received the following problem from Mr. N. Travers, of Twickenham, who would be glad to learn the author's name. It is a very interesting position of a class of problem now somewhat out of vogue:—

White: K to Q 6th, B at Q 4th, Kt at Q B 8th, Pawns at Q B 4th and Q R 3rd. (Five pieces.)

Black: K at Q R 3rd, Pawn at Q R 5th. (Two pieces.)

White to play, and mate in four moves.

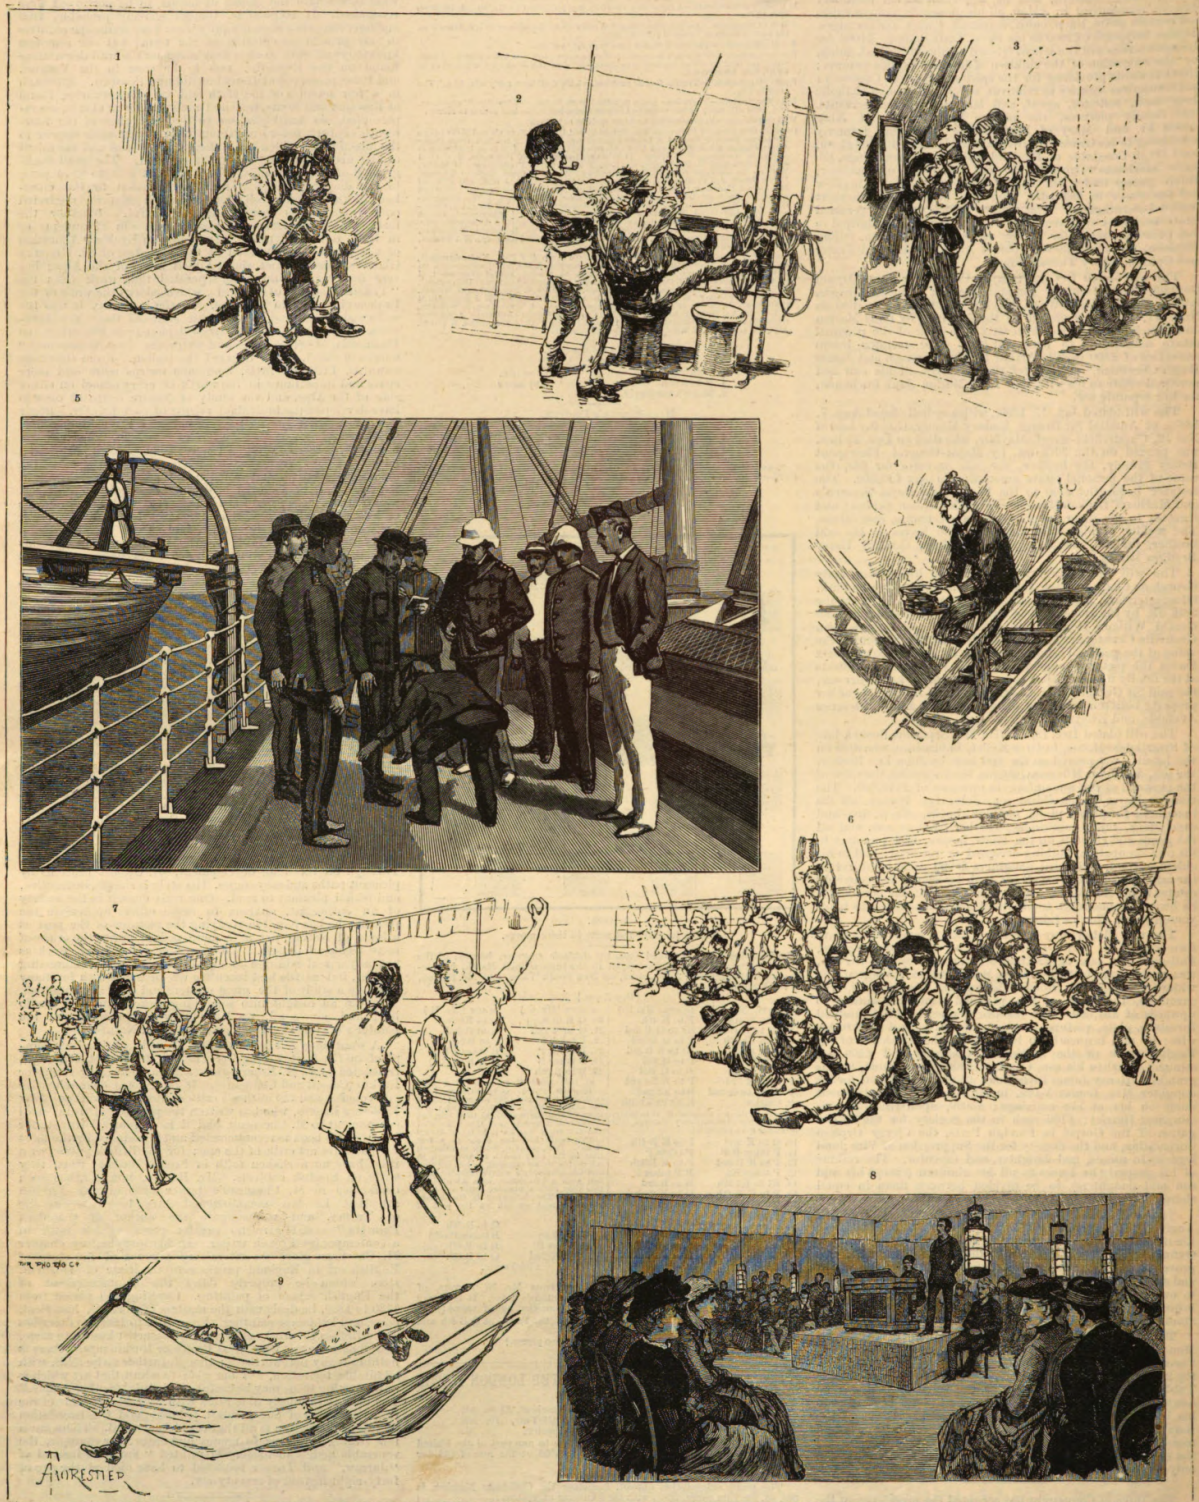
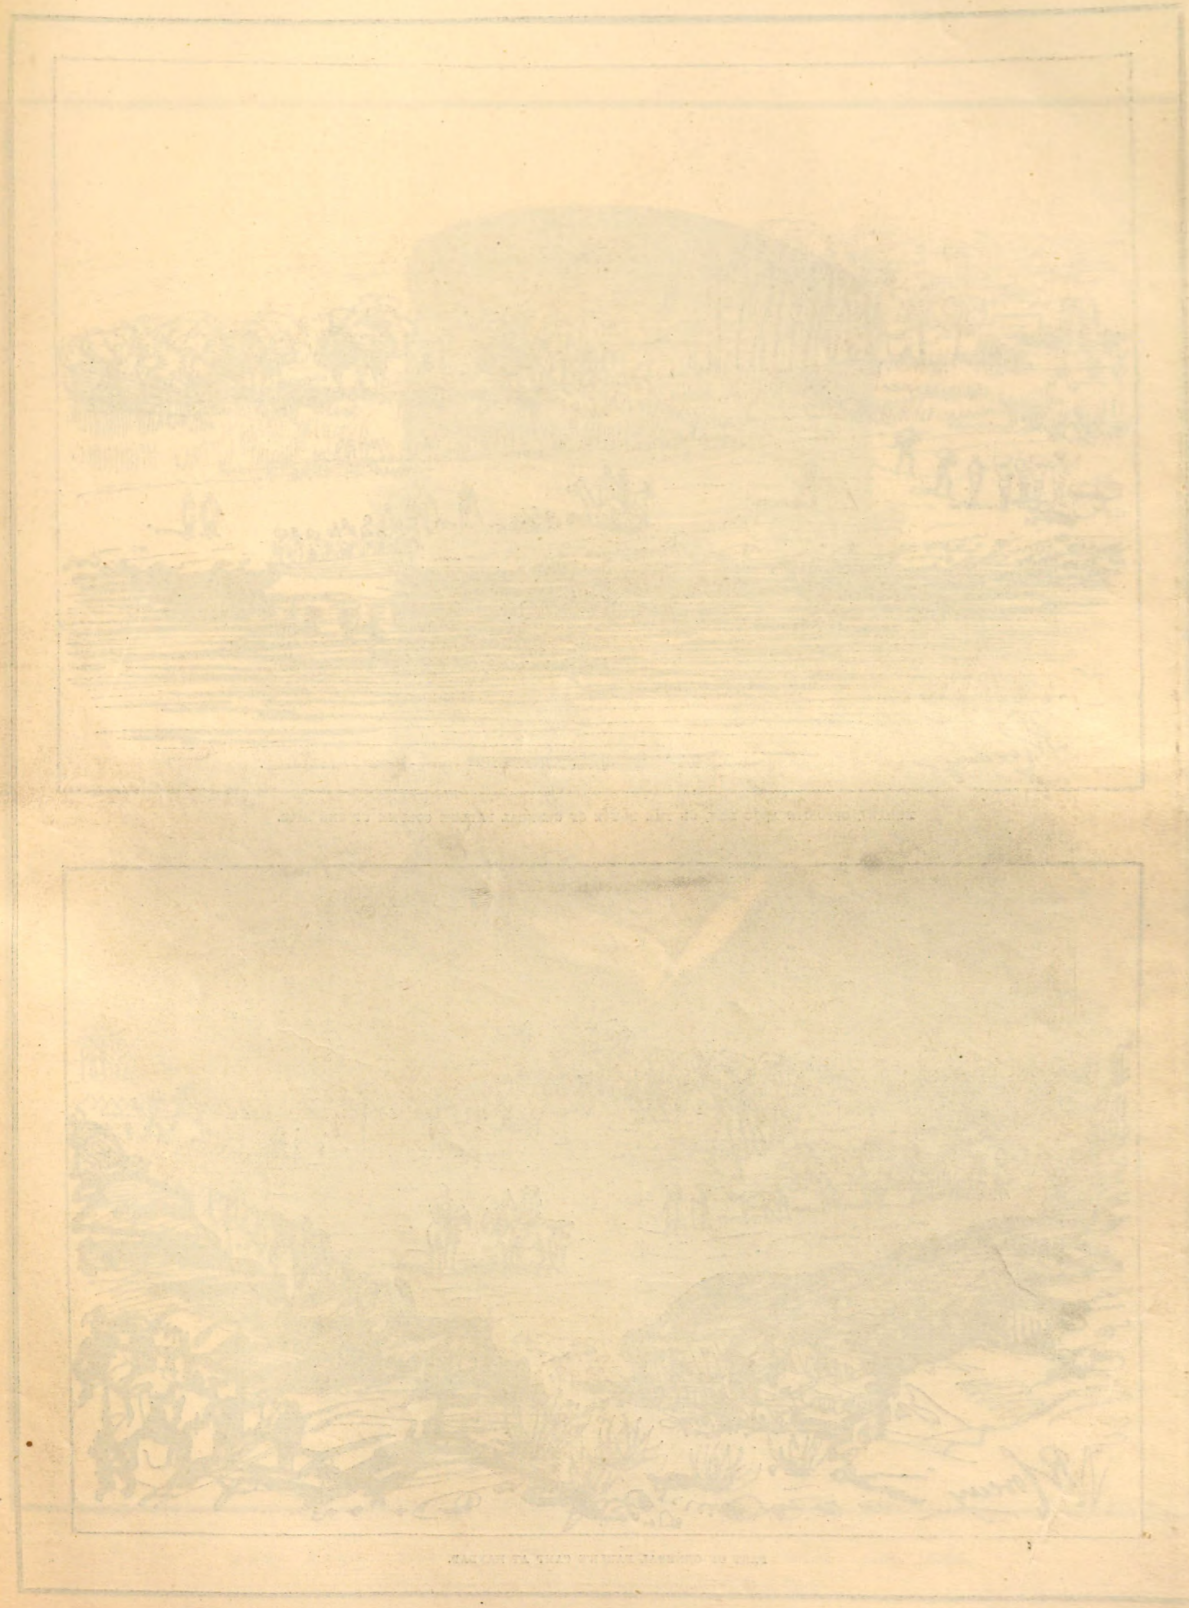
ART BOOKS.



Those who can recollect the interest aroused by Mr. J. Gilbert's delightful and valuable study on Titian and the Cadore country, will welcome his new volume, Landscape in Art (John Murray, 1885), which is, in a sense, the complement of his first work. Mr. Gilbert's aim has been to trace the position occupied by landscape in art, and to show by what slow stages the claims of nature to be portrayed were recognised. It is possible, though scarcely probable, that amongst the painters of antiquity there were landscape painters in our present acceptation of the term; but our remotest knowledge of such work is that based on the wall decorations found on the Esquiline, now to be seen in the Vatican, and those preserved at Herculaneum and Pompeii. Although in a few mosaics of the sixth and seventh centuries, found at Ravenna and Rome, trees and rocks, and even clouds, are represented, we must pass on to the very close of the fourteenth century before anything like backgrounds appear in the missal work, which alone absorbed the time and the talent of the artists of that interesting period. The gold background of the saints and Madonnas had first to give place to the diaper, perhaps a touching allusion to the cross-bars of the monk's cell, beyond which Nature, neglected and feared, was bright and beautiful. Whether the first note of freedom was struck in Flanders or in Italy, it is hard to say. In John van Eyck's "Adoration of the Lamb"—to be seen at the Cathedral of St. Bavon at Ghent—landscape first showed itself north of the Alps; but very few years could have separated that work from the "Tribute Money" of Masaccio, which adorns the walls of the Brancacci Chapel in Florence. In the one case, it was the walls and towers and innumerable spires of the "New Jerusalem" which the Flemish artist depicted; in the other, the Pisan hills, of which here and there the tops are lost under masses of cloud, which inspired the Italian. From that time onwards, little by little, landscape usurps more and more space and importance in the works of every school on either side of the Alps, and the study of Nature seems at once to have developed the individual talents of each painter. Roger van der Weyden was no mere imitator of his contemporary, van Eyck; nor was Ghirlandaio of Masaccio. Yet one can believe that, had the Rubicon never been crossed, both would have gone on repeating with mechanical monotony the angular Madonnas and wooden saints with which missal painting had for so many centuries been content. In Italy, progress was more rapid than in the north, under the influence of Botticelli, who excelled in trees; of Leonardo Da Vinci, for whom the stalactite caverns had at one time so great a fascination; and of Perugino, who treated mountain forms and lake shores with equal skill and tenderness, and pointed the road to that perfection which Raffaelle attained. But throughout this and the succeeding period of art, Flemish as well as Italian, the landscape was still only an accessory—the mere setting of the picture—religious or secular. And it is not until we reach Titian that we have any trace of what we should, in these days, describe as a landscape; and of Titian there is the tradition of only four of such works—all now lost, except the one belonging to the Queen, and hidden from the public at Buckingham Palace. But in the majority of the great Venetian's works some trace of the surroundings of the world in which he lived is always be found: the mountains above Belluno, the sea beyond Chioggia, or the deep valleys of the Euganean Hills, are constantly appearing. From Titian's time, however, although the decadence of Italian art was soon to set in, the cause of landscape painting for itself had been won—Tintoretto, the Caracci, and Domenichino handed on its traditions to Guercino, which, after him, were to revive, in temporary splendour, under the magic brush of the unrivalled Claude, to be sustained for a while by Salvator Rosa, and to close a brilliant era with Gaspard Poussin. In the Netherlands, a very similar course may be traced from Mabuse to Paul Bril and "peasant" and "velvet" Breughel, until the genius of Rubens arose like a sun among the lesser lights. Through all this long development, Mr. Gilbert leads us by pleasant paths and easy stages. His style is simple, instructive, and withal pleasant to read. One feels oneself in the society of an enthusiast, anxious to make others appreciate the pleasure he has found in studying the pictures of the past as a lover of Nature, not as a mere pedant nor as the critic of mere technical details. We therefore welcome his work as not only a real addition to our knowledge of an interesting subject, but as the best incentive we have met with for many years to a study of the great masters and their surroundings. We gain an insight into something more than their studio life; and, above all, we learn how monotonous was the painter's art until he sought inspiration in Nature.

A want long felt by lovers of English art has been supplied in The English School of Painting, by Ernest Chesneau, translated by L. N. Etherington, with a preface by Professor Ruskin (Cassell and Company). It is at once comprehensive and concise, and the author's critical judgment is indorsed by Professor Ruskin, who has written the preface. It is no small compliment to M. Chesneau, and it is certainly fortunate for him that his book is recommended and introduced by the most authoritative art critic of the age; for the British public, as a rule, have no unshaken faith in French authors when they write on English subjects. Mr. Ruskin, however, has such confidence in M. Chesneau's power of analysing English art that he has commissioned him to write a life of Turner, and we suppose the author of "Modern Painters" could give no greater proof of his faith in a contemporary French writer. In his introductory chapter M. Chesneau gives an interesting account of the state of English art in England previous to the time of Hogarth, from whom he properly dates the commencement of the English school of painting. Covering the period from 1730 to 1850, he deals with the masters of portrait, historical, genre, and landscape painting. From 1850 to 1882, he describes and criticises the works of every English artist known to fame, as well as some "of whom," as Professor Ruskin says, "there is nothing really noteworthy"; though further on he adds, with admirable toleration, "I am glad to admit that art which is uninteresting to me may be useful and helpful to other people." The book is profusely illustrated with sketches of some of the principal works of our greatest painters, and the translation by Miss Etherington is all that could be desired. There are a few trifling errors as to names and dates; for example, the venerable Bede's monastery is printed "Yarrow" instead of "Jarrow," and Turner is stated to have died at the age of forty-eight instead of seventy-six.

Alderman Sir John Whittaker Ellis, M.P., has been re-elected by the Court of Common Council Governor of the Irish Society, which body manage the extensive estates of the London Corporation in the province of Ulster; and Mr. Biggs Deputy-Governor.



The annual dinner of the friends of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools for Orphans and Necessitous Children will take place at the Cannon-street Hotel next Wednesday. The chair will be taken by Mr. S. Hope Morley, treasurer of the institution, supported by the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, at half-past five precisely.

SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. WILLIAM SIMPSON.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

The political importance of this question is forcibly impressed on the public mind by the presence now in London of M. Lessar, a French engineer and geographer in the Russian service, who is sent here to discuss with our Foreign Office those very details of frontier topography which ought to be examined on the spot by the joint British and Russian Commissions. Sir Peter Lumsden with his staff, accompanied by Mr. William Simpson, our Special Artist, arrived two months ago at Bala Murghab, the appointed place of meeting, about one hundred miles north-east of Herat, and they are still kept waiting for General Zelenoy, the Russian Commissioner, who has not yet set forth from Tiflis, and can hardly reach the proposed scene of operations before April. This unexplained failure of the Russian Government to keep its appointment, with the uncalled-for mission of M. Lessar to London, is a cause for much dissatisfaction and suspicion of its real intentions. Our Special Artist has diligently employed himself in making a number of Sketches of all places of interest between the Heri-rud and Murghab Rivers, in the country on the Afghan frontier, towards Sarakhs and Merv, which may possibly become the subject of a serious dispute. It is a territory of no great extent, measuring less than a hundred and fifty miles from west to east; but it is absolutely essential to the military defence of Herat, and to the political security of Afghanistan. The two large rivers above named, the Heri-rud (or Tejend), flowing southward to Herat, on the Persian border, and the Murghab, flowing northward from the Paropamisus mountain range to Merv and Russian Turkestan, inclose a district inhabited by frontier tribes called the Salors and the Badghis, who have been always reckoned subjects of the Ameer of Afghanistan. During the last few months, without any claim being advanced by diplomatic negotiations, the Russian military officials at Sarakhs have presumed to push forward their outposts to Pul-i-Khatun, on the Heri-rud, actually within the Persian territory, and to Penjdeh, on the Murghab, which certainly belongs to Afghanistan. These unwarrantable acts, committed to the prejudice of the intended friendly settlement of the frontier question, cannot be allowed to pass without a decided protest on the part of the British Government, as well as of the Ameer Abdurrahman Khan, and perhaps also of the Shah of Persia. The situation of affairs is now watched by all who have studied the question with very grave anxiety; and our Artist's Sketches, with the accurate descriptive notes which he has furnished to us, may soon be found of the greatest value. The country has never been visited, hitherto, by Europeans able to record minute and careful observations either of the localities or of the people; and we feel sure that the importance of Mr. Simpson's work, at the present moment, cannot fail to be appreciated by those in authority, as well as by the readers of this Journal.

In the meantime, reserving for early publication, when our space permits, his Illustrations of the disputed Afghan frontier, we must be content this week to give a few more of our Artist's interesting Sketches of Khorassan, the eastern province of the Persian empire, through which he journeyed on horseback with Sir Peter Lumsden's party, from Teheran to the banks of the Heri-rud. The whole length of the northern frontier of Khorassan, but more especially "the great highway of Central Asia," the road from Shahrud to Meshed, is of much political, military, and commercial importance. It runs several hundred miles from west to east, nearly parallel with the new Russian road and half-constructed line of railway up the Attrek valley, which leads from the Caspian Sea towards the Afghan frontier. This consideration, besides the ancient historical renown of the decayed Persian cities along the route, and the esteem in which they are held by the Mohammedan nations, gives a particular interest to our Views of Shahrud and Meshed. We have already described the position of Shahrud, which is a town of some traffic on the way to Asterabad and the Russian seaports of the Caspian. On the road from Persia is Damghan, situated below the mountains reputed to have been the abode of the "Old Man of the Mountain," the notorious Hassan Subbagh, the founder of the Assassins in Syria. His home was a castle, but water flowed through it, and the place was made into a delightful garden. The followers of this man were initiated into his system or service, and were taught that they could not die; hence the place was called Labyamoot, or "Without Death." We do not know whether there are any remains of this castle yet to be seen. Hassan Subbagh lived in the time of the Crusades; that is a long time ago, and his deathless gardens may have entirely disappeared. When young, Hassan Subbagh was a companion of the elegant Persian poet, Omar Khayyoum, whose tomb at Nishapore was lately visited by our Artist. Mr. Simpson contributes a sketch of Damghan, and one of a venerable old chunar-tree, or plane-tree, which he saw at Shahrud; it is a very fine one, being, by a rough measurement, about 18 ft. diameter. It is in one of the suburbs of Shahrud, where there is a small village and a mill.

The Holy City of Meshed, the capital of Khorassan, stands on a plain, which is part of the valley of the Keshef Rud, or Keshef River, for Rud is the word here used in that sense. About twenty miles to the west there is a large spring of water; it is called Chesmeh Gilas, or the Cherry Fountain. The water is brought by an artificial watercourse all the way to Meshed, where it forms a canal through the principal street, which is called the Khiaban. This supplies the city with water. Meshed is at least four miles in circumference, and has a mud wall of defence. The view from the south-east shows the Eedgah Gate, on the outside of which is a large burial-ground, and a number of brick-kilns. This view also shows the shrine of the Imam Reza, with its golden dome and minarets.

During a dense fog on Wednesday, the British India steamer El Dorado, 3332 tons, was wrecked on one of the Berling islands, near the coast of Portugal. The crew and some military officers, the only passengers on board, were saved. The vessel carried about 600 tons of military stores for the army in Egypt, including a much-needed supply of clothing for the troops in the Soudan.

At a meeting of the Court of Common Council on the 12th inst, the Town Clerk read a letter from Earl Stanhope, chairman of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, offering to appropriate for the perpetual use and enjoyment of the inhabitants of the metropolis Gravel-Pit Wood, at Highgate, comprising sixty-nine acres, and thirty acres of land at Kilburn, forming a portion of the site occupied in 1879 by the Royal Agricultural Show. The offer is made by the commissioners on condition that the Corporation shall obtain Parliamentary sanction for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to make the proposed appropriation, and shall undertake to lay out and maintain these two spaces as parks in perpetuity.

EN ROUTE TO BECHUANALAND.

A few Sketches by Mr. Julius M. Price, our Special Artist with the volunteer corps raised in London under the name of "The South African Irregular Force," otherwise called "Methuen's Horse," to serve the Government of the Cape Colony in restoring law and order in Bechuanaland, are presented in this Number of our Journal. These Sketches were all taken on board the Pembroke Castle, the vessel which conveyed three hundred of the volunteers from England to Capetown in December; and the incidents of personal experience during the voyage, the sleeping in hammocks, the washing, shaving, and dressing; the fetching breakfast or dinner for a mess, the tailor's business of measuring for uniforms, the lounging, smoking, and chatting on deck, and the assemblage of passengers to enjoy an entertainment of vocal music or recitation, fill the page very well. Our Special Artist and his comrades of No. 5 Troop, arriving at Capetown on Dec. 19, were started off next day to Barkly, West Griqualand, where the whole force was to rendezvous on Jan. 14, and his latest communication to us is dated from that place, "with the Royal Engineers," on the 17th ult. We observe that the present style and title of his regiment, since its formal enrolment, is the "1st Mounted Rifles," under the command of Colonel the Hon. Paul Methuen, C.B. The 2nd Mounted Rifles are commanded by Major Stapleton, of the 20th Hussars. On the 12th ult., there were already collected at Barkly, or on the way to Barkly, a squadron of Inniskilling Dragoons, a battery of Gardner guns, five companies of the Royal Scots, four troops of Methuen's, and two of Carrington's. A correspondent who is not one of the corps, writing on the 4th from Langford camp, the head-quarters of Major-General Sir Charles Warren, says, "The behaviour of the 1st Mounted Rifles has been beyond all praise. Colonel Methuen certainly works his regiment harder than any other in the force. From four a.m. to dinner-time, and again in the afternoon, they seem always at stables, on parade, or out doing field-firing or outpost duty; and, so far as outsiders can see, there is always the same cheerfulness and keenness. No doubt they have yet much to learn in the way of drill, and possibly something of the customs and discipline of the service; but on the whole they have progressed with giant strides, and in a few months should be one of the smartest, as they are one of the finest, bodies of men in the service."

The Charity Commissioners have directed a public inquiry to be held respecting the administration of the municipal charities of the city of Canterbury.

The twenty-ninth anniversary dinner of the Dramatic and Musical Sick Fund took place at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, as usual, on Ash Wednesday. Mr. John Hare occupied the chair, and was supported by the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs and by an influential list of stewards.

Mr. E. Stanford, of Charing-cross, has published a new map, designed to illustrate the military operations in the Soudan. The references to places on the Nile, between Korti and Khartoum, are very complete. The track across the Bayuda Desert, from Merawi to Metammeh, is clearly defined; so also is that from Souakim to Berber, and the map is made of additional value by an illustration of Khartoum, showing the position of the Government House, the palace, the Hospital, and powder magazine. In the present position of affairs the map will prove most useful.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR REDVERS BULLER, C.B., K.C.M.G.,
COMMANDING THE ADVANCED FORCE AT ABOU KLEA.

CHEERING THE ARRIVAL OF FOUR OF GORDON'S STEAMERS AT METAMMEH, DURING THE FIRST ATTEMPT ON THE TOWN, JAN. 21.
FACSIMILE OF SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. MELTON PRIOR.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

It is now said to be definitively settled that Princess Beatrice will be married to Prince Henry of Battenberg at Osborne towards the end of July, and that the happy pair will spend their honeymoon at Quarr Abbey, a beautiful place on Wootton Creek, about two miles from Ryde, belonging to Lady Cochrane, who will lend it them for the occasion. The abbey was originally a Cistercian foundation, like Netley and Tintern, and the monks of that order had a vast amount of taste both in the choice and architecture of their habitats. There are but few relics left of ancient Quarr; a meadow smiles where the cells once stood, a farm-yard occupies the site of the chapel and monastery, and the refectory is now a barn. Some huge mossy stones just above the beach are probably the remains of its seaward fortifications, erected about the middle of the fourteenth century by an abbot, who was also warden of the Isle of Wight, and charged with its defence against all foreign foes.

An undoubted fact coming to us from the wilds of Dakota brings with it a waft of the atmosphere of Hiawatha, and sounds too romantically unreal for the nineteenth century. A New York journalist, Mr. Stanley Huntley, has become chief of all the Sioux tribes; and this is how it came about. Some years ago, before the famous Sitting Bull surrendered, Huntley was sent by a Chicago paper to Northern Montana to interview him. Circumstances drove the journalist into British North-West territory, where he became the guest of a Major Walsh, round whose post many old and feeble Indians with their squaws were encamped. Among them was Little Knife, head and chief of the Teton nation, who had a bad leg, and was given up as incurable by the medicine men. Huntley had some knowledge of simples and speedily cured the old chief, who gratefully pronounced him his son by adoption. Both his own sons, Mountain Bull and Young Antelope, are now dead, and Huntley, whose tie of adoption is considered stronger than that of consanguinity, becomes chief of the Sioux. His Indian name is Waukpey Wankan, or Holy Leaf.

It is very sad when such relics as war medals, priceless in the eyes of the brave soldiers who won them long ago, are knocked down by the auctioneer's hammer for a mere song to strangers. Owing to the unfortunate bankruptcy of the Earl of Berkeley, no less than twenty-one medals, given to different members of his family for Waterloo, Talavera, Badajoz, the Peninsular War, the Crimea, India, and South Africa, were thus sold in Bond-street last week, together with portraits by Gainsborough and G. Romney, and a large quantity of antique silver plate, most of which fetched from 10s. to 25s. per ounce.

Benjamin West was one of the earliest American artists, and, as he was a native of Pennsylvania, his mind and works had a Puritan, almost a mystic, bias. His picture of "Death on the Pale Horse" exercised a curious influence on the public when exhibited in London early in the present century, and the painter remained here till his death, in 1820. A portfolio that belonged to him, containing twenty of his own sketches from Hebrew history and Christian legend, has just been presented by Mr. George Childs to the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts. It appears that four years after West's death his goods and chattels were sold, and Mr. Childs purchased this portfolio and its contents from a daughter of the person who then bought them.

The articles on Society in Vienna are the chief attraction of La Nouvelle Revue at the present time. No one knows who writes them, for Comte Paul Vasili is merely a nom de plume. They are not malicious or scandalous, but they say "who's who" most fearlessly. How Princess Metternich receives for Baron Nathaniel Rothschild, who is a confirmed old bachelor, known as Natti to his intimate friends; how the millionaire Baron Hirsch hides in one hand the very small gratuity he bestows on a "jarvey"; and how a penniless Polish Countess became Madame De Löwenthal, and the mother of the Duchesse Decazes, are all racy stories, and thoroughly appreciated in Paris, where la haute finance of Vienna is as well known as in the city to which it has affiliated itself.

A pretty anecdote, not without its touch of pathos, is going the rounds of the French press respecting the Princess of Wales. A French lady said to her one day, "Your Royal Highness speaks English, French, and German equally well." "Yes," replied the Princess, "but I always think in Danish." In this land we shall never love her the less for not having forgotten her own country and her father's house.

Southey, in his "Doctor," pointed out the connection between topography and patriotism. With equal felicity the so-called "Lake poet" might have dwelt on the connection between topography and literature. Among the books announced for publication we see a History of Dorking, a town famous for the lovely scenery that encircles it on all sides and teeming with literary associations. There, for instance, is The Deepdene, praised by Aubrey and John Evelyn, the home, in later years, of Thomas Hope, the author of "Anastasius," and the haunt of Disraeli when writing "Coningsby"; there is Evelyn's seat of Wotton, a paradise of beauty; there, hidden in leafy loveliness, is The Rookery, once tenanted by "Population Malthus"; there flows, or tries to flow, the "silent Mole," celebrated by six poets; there, in Betchworth Park, lived, probably, William Browne, the poet, and "truly beloved friend" of Ben Jonson, and lived, certainly, Abraham Tucker, the philosopher, of whom Sir Henry Taylor has said that "an intellect more exact and discursive was never exercised in theology." At the foot of Boxhill, famous for its picnics, Keats wrote a portion of "Endymion"; and there resides one of the most famous, though by no means the most popular, of contemporary novelists. Dr. Johnson's favourite, Fanny Burney, when transformed into Madame D'Arblay, lived within a mile of the hill; and hard by, at the famous seat of Norbury, dwelt her friend William Locke, "the Mæcenas of English literature and art." "I remember," said the painter James Northcote, "when Mr. Locke, of Norbury Park, first came over from Italy, and old Dr. Moore, who had a high opinion of him, was crying up his drawings, and asked me if I did not think he would make a great painter? I said, 'No; never?' 'Why not?' 'Because he has six thousand a year.'" Pity that every artist who fails has not a similar consolation!

Hitherto, the painful complaint called "Writer's Cramp" has been regarded by medical men as practically incurable. In Dr. Quain's "Dictionary of Medicine," the author of a paper on the subject vividly describes the growing agony of a clerk whose livelihood depends on the use of the pen, upon finding it day by day more difficult to write. Galvanism will be tried and other remedies resorted to, but the case generally goes from bad to worse, and at length the poor scrivener loses his office and his income. There is good news for him now. Dr. De Watteville, of St. Mary's Hospital, relates several instances of writer's cramp, one being of seventeen years' duration, which have been cured in a few weeks by the application of rubbing, kneading, and gymnastics. The happy discoverer of this treatment is a German, who has lately come to London. What a warm welcome Thomas Carlyle, who was unable to hold a pen for the last fifteen years of his life, would have given to Mr. Julius Wolff! We are not told, however, of any case in which the treatment has proved efficacious in old age. The method, at present, is comparatively in its infancy.

So we are to have a Billiard Association, or a National Billiard Association, who will let us know what we really may (if we can) and may not do at the various games played on a billiard-table. It was quite time that some move was made in this direction; as the laws of such games do not at present by any means resemble the law of the Medes and Persians, but vary according to the customs of different rooms or according to the sweet will of certain "markers" and manufacturers. Meanwhile, Mr. John Roberts, jun., has been doing more wonders to justify him in adopting the title of "champion." It was a great thing to give 3000 points out of 12,000 and a beating to such an ex-champion as Mr. Joseph Bennett; but it was perhaps a greater to give 3000 points out of 10,000 and a beating to such a candidate for the championship as Mr. T. Taylor; because it is doubtful whether the latter has yet attained his zenith. At the same time, it is doubtful whether it accords with dignity and propriety that a player who has held the championship, or has competed for it, should accept points in a public match. Perhaps the new association may take the question into consideration; and at any rate may have a word to say about the absurd number of "champions," amounting to something like a score or more.

Scarcely a week passes without the law courts being occupied with cases where innocent trustees, being robbed by their agents, are ordered to refund vast sums of money. Of course, everybody accepting a trust is bound to carry it out, but the general practice is to leave the business arrangements to a solicitor. Of late, unfortunately, several of these have proved dishonest, and the result is a personal loss to those who had no personal interest in the funds missing. It is a common thing for friends to appoint each other trustees under wills or marriage settlements, and the request to act is generally accompanied by a statement that the office "is merely nominal." Soon there will be a difficulty in obtaining responsible persons to run risks where they have no prospects of gain, and some new procedure must be adopted. The appointment by Government of an official trustee, whose duties are carried out by an official staff at the expense of the trust funds, would be welcome to testators, who would gladly pay a small percentage, out of which the State would certainly derive no inconsiderable revenue.

If literature as a profession be worth cultivating in England, and we have constant evidence before us that it is, how much more enticing must it be in Russia? The favourite Minister of the Czar Alexander I. gave an impetus to writing that should go far to stimulate Muscovite school-boys of to-day to study hard in that direction. All the universities and the public schools in this country from time to time offer prizes for essays, either on social, political, or philosophical subjects; but the most gigantic premium ever accessible was bequeathed in 1825 by M. Araktcheyeff. He left a sum equal to about four thousand pounds to accumulate at compound interest, and to be given a hundred years afterwards to the author of the best work on the life and times of the testator's master, Alexander I. Although forty years is a long time to look forward to, yet more than one aspirant, or perhaps more correctly, his parents or guardians, have commenced to study the subject with the object of eventually carrying off the offered fortune. For a fortune it will be, amounting with accumulations, in 1925, to just on twenty thousand pounds!

An ingenious advertising American has invented a machine for the purpose of reducing the size of unduly large noses. It is a little metal clamp not unlike the bridge of pince-nez, and for fear of exciting notice or laying the wearer of it open to a charge of vanity, the inventor recommends that it be worn at night. Yet large noses have been considered as significant of intelligence, and the great Duke of Wellington and the ancient Romans have been held up as evidences of this fact. The Transatlantic mechanic does not announce whether the excessive intellect will also be restrained by the use of his instrument, and until we know this for certain his invention will not be generally used without some diffideuce in this country.

The beautiful hotel of the Duchesse de Mouchy, where the Empress Eugénie stays on her occasional visits to Paris, is at present little known, and, in fact, has only been thoroughly finished during the last few months. The entresol contains only private apartments, and the first floor is given up entirely to splendid reception-rooms, three of which face the Esplanade des Invalides. Here the Duchess has surrounded herself with pictures, marbles, and bronzes, all of which have a history; and her Sèvres and Saxe porcelaine, enamels, faïences, &c., form a perfect museum. One very large picture is a lifesize portrait of Murat, another is of Maréchal de Mouchy; while the miniatures of the first Napoleon by Legnay, and of Queen Caroline and her daughter, by Isabey, are highly prized. The mistress of this charming house does not intend to throw it open this season, although on Tuesday she gave a quiet, if significant, dinner to her young cousin, Prince Victor Napoleon, and a few chosen friends.

The ghastly result of the attempt to hang the Babbacombe murderer, although truly terrible, is not altogether without parallel in the history of executions. At Edinburgh, in the year 1728, a woman, named Dixon, was condemned to death for the murder of a child; and the dread sentence of the law was apparently carried out. But her body, after being put in the coffin, was handed over to her friends for burial. Before the lid was finally fastened down, the executed woman sat up, dazed but alive. After a few days of medical treatment, she was able to walk about, and finally recovered; and, of course, got off, for humanity and Scotch law prevented any more experiments. Twelve years later, the body of a murderer, who had been hanged at Tyburn, was sent to the Surgeons' Hall for dissection. There it was found that he had been but partially executed, and he got well, his sentence being commuted to transportation for life. John Lee has been more fortunate than either of these; for, if his mental agony was stupendous, at least it is consolatory to know that he was spared bodily torture.

Whether there are an unusual number of working people out of employment just now, and the causes that have led to such a state of things, are questions for the political economist; but here is a stern fact that speaks volumes. On Tuesday morning a vast crowd of young men, whose ages varied apparently from sixteen to thirty, collected in the Strand. Such a mob was there that the police had to interfere, and traffic was temporarily impeded. And the reason was simply this. A restaurateur had advertised for a youth as porter, and intimated that applicants must call at a certain day and hour. He did not expect to be besieged; but it is estimated that he had five hundred aspirants for a post of hard work, at the remuneration of fifteen shillings a week.

Lovers of sport have at this time of the year their attention turned chiefly to coursing, of which the Waterloo Cup, under the patronage of Lord Sefton, has for some years past been regarded as the principal event. As with horse-racing, however, so with coursing, sport is becoming business; and it is prophesied that "gate-money" meetings, with their big prizes, at Kempton Park and elsewhere, will gradually cause "Ichabod" to be the cry at Altcar. Not this year, however, can that cry be raised, though the performances may have been less glorious, and the final result less conclusive, from the withdrawal or reservation of formidable competitors, than was the case in the days of the celebrated greyhound Master M'Grath.

The season of coursing recalls the memory of the famous greyhound Snowball, of Norfolk sire and Yorkshire dam. Of him it was recorded by his owner, the once renowned sportsman Major Topham, of the Wolds, Yorkshire, at the beginning of this century, that he "won ten large pieces of silver plate, and upwards of forty matches, having accepted every challenge, from whatever dogs of different countries (? counties) were brought against him." In our day he would, no doubt, have won large sums of "added money" at "inclosed" meetings.

Ash Wednesday is over, and "strict training" has been going on ever since among the crews who are to contend for the (light or dark) "blue ribbon" of the water on the Thames at Easter, or the week before Easter. The affair is, fortunately, losing a little of the ridiculous and wholly factitious importance assigned to it not so very many years ago, when, in the fever of competition, a newspaper went so far as to discourse about the boils which the training had produced (as it frequently does) upon the bodies of the energetic young gentlemen. It seems that there will be trouble this year (for there always is some fuss and trouble of some kind) about the course, in consequence of the work which is going on at Hammersmith Bridge.

The Carnival, which used to be so gaily celebrated at Paris, seems to have died out of public notice there altogether. This, perhaps, is no matter for regret; inasmuch as the scenes which took place in the palmy days of the Carnival, when the eccentric "French"-Englishman, Lord Henry Seymour, was a conspicuous figure at the "Vendanges de Bourgogne," and threw hot sovereigns or louis-d'or (for he was a pleasant gentleman) to the crowd during the "descente de la Courtille," together with the wild orgies of the "barrier balls," can hardly be considered to have tended to edification. And so Charles the Eighth's institution of the "bœuf gras" seems to have suffered irremediable extinction.

At Leicester, says report in the newspapers, five thousand persons (out of a population reaching about a hundred and sixty thousand) are to be prosecuted for refusing to comply with the ordinances of the Vaccination Act. Evidently, therefore, vaccination is not in universal favour with the Leicestrians; and evidently a very large number of the Leicestrians, having a strong opinion adverse to the operation, have also the courage of their strong opinion.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

A complete alteration of the military plans and prospects has followed the Fall of Khartoum. They depend, of course, upon the political object in view, which seems to be entirely changed. Since there is no Gordon now to be rescued, and no garrison at Khartoum to be relieved, it is proposed to "break down the power of the Mahdi at Khartoum." But this cannot be done till September; therefore, Lord Wolseley has to withdraw that part of his forces which advanced last month very near to Khartoum, and to concentrate his army on the part of the Nile immediately above his present head-quarters at Korti, extending up the river to Abou Hamed; while the new expedition, sent out from England to be under the command of Sir Gerald Graham at Souakim, is expected in September to proceed inland to Berber, and to join Lord Wolseley's forces in the final advance on Khartoum.

In the meantime, the safe withdrawal across the Bayuda Desert of the column originally led by Sir Herbert Stewart, now commanded by Sir Redvers Buller, has become the most anxious care of the military situation. This gallant force, comprising the famous Camel Corps of picked soldiers from many of our finest regiments, was dispatched from Korti on Jan. 8, for the purpose of relieving General Gordon as quickly as possible; fought and won the battle of Abou Klea on the 17th; fought again on the 19th, when Sir Herbert Stewart was mortally wounded; made an attempt, on the 21st, to take the town of Metammeh, but desisted from that attempt, and lodged itself in an intrenched camp on the river-bank at Gubat, or Abou Kru, where Gordon's armed steamers promised to afford communication with Khartoum. On the 24th, Sir Charles Wilson went up the river, but on the 28th found that Khartoum had surrendered to the Mahdi the day before. Sir Redvers Buller arrived at Gubat, Feb. 11, to take the command, reinforced by the Royal Irish Regiment, which had marched across the Desert on foot. The enemy's position at Metammeh, strengthened by the addition of five thousand men from Khartoum, apparently including the revolted Soudanese troops of Gordon's former garrison, was found too strong for Buller to attack, while it was apprehended that the Mahdi's army, or a large part of it, would come down upon him from Khartoum. Under these circumstances, and in accordance with positive orders from Lord Wolseley, on the 13th inst., Sir Redvers Buller, having first sent away the wounded, left the fortified encampment on the Nile, destroying the two steam-boats which remained, and retired to Abou Klea, eighteen miles from the river, on his return route to Gakdul and to Korti. His force consisted of part of the Guards Camel Corps, part of the Heavy Cavalry Camel Corps, and a squadron of the 19th Hussars, which he sent at once to Gakdul; the Naval Brigade, with two Gardner machine-guns; a detachment of Royal Artillery, with two guns; part of the Mounted Infantry, portions of the Sussex and Royal Irish Regiments, details of departmental corps—in all about sixteen hundred British—and some native troops. Their march was harassed considerably, on the 16th and 17th, by strong parties of the Arabs, who also fired into the camp at night, killing four and wounding twenty-five of our men; but the Royal Irish and Mounted Infantry kept them off, and four or five of the Hussars, led by Major Wardrop, rode boldly round the enemy, firing singly at them, and making them believe that a large force was at hand. General Buller was expected to reach Gakdul on Thursday of this week. General Sir Evelyn Wood is there, in a very strong position.

We deeply regret to learn that Sir Herbert Stewart died of his wound soon after he was brought to Gakdul.

Different native versions of the tragedy at Khartoum are received at the British head-quarters; one story is that General Gordon was not shot, but was killed with swords and spears. The soldiers had consulted among themselves whether to take him alive or not, but they decided upon killing him, "because if they took him alive to the Mahdi he would be spared, and they did not wish this, as they thought that he ought to be killed, as he was the cause of all the trouble." The regular soldiers were spared, except the men holding the Boori Gate. These were killed, but the man who made cartridges for the rest was kept alive. No women or children were killed.

The Mahdi has ordered his people to collect all the animals they can and to prepare large numbers of water-skins, as they would soon move again. But food is said to be dreadfully scarce all along the bank of the Nile, as General Gordon's foraging parties from the steamers, and the bands of the Mahdi, have swept away everything edible from the villages for a great distance above and below Khartoum.

Our large Engraving of the Battle of Abou Klea, showing the manner in which the Arab charge was repulsed, is a forcible delineation of a notable fighting scene. The enemy are believed to have numbered about ten thousand, while Sir Herbert Stewart's force did not much exceed fourteen hundred. His troops were formed into square, the Mounted Infantry on the left half-front, the Artillery in the centre, the Guards on the right half-front, another detachment of the Guards and a portion of the Sussex Regiment on the right flank, and the Heavies and Mounted Infantry on the left flank. In the rear were more of the Heavy Brigade and the Naval Brigade. The Gardner guns were placed in the centre of the square. In this formation the troops advanced to meet the overwhelming force of the enemy. The latter occupied favourable ground, and had, just before the engagement, almost disappeared from view, leaving their standards only visible; then, on a sudden, a large body reappeared, and wildly charged the front of the British square. But soon, unable to stand the deadly fire poured on them, the Arabs turned and furiously attacked the left rear of the square. The Heavies were borne down by the onslaught, and broke the formation for a few moments, but they quickly rallied, and engaged in hand-to-hand fighting with the Arabs, who had penetrated their ranks, and who were at the same time subject to a murderous fire from the Guards and Mounted Infantry. The enemy, thus beset on all sides, were at last driven back, having lost, it is calculated, some 1200 men in killed and wounded. The battle fought on the 19th, in the advance from Abou Klea to the Nile above Metammeh, was an example of similar tactics; and the enemy was again repulsed with the loss of a thousand men, while the British loss was twelve killed in the square, and sixteen in the zereba, or hedged inclosure, held by Lord Charles Beresford with Captain Norton's guns and the Guards under Lord Cochrane. Nearly a hundred on our side were wounded. It was on this occasion that Sir Herbert Stewart received his fatal wound.

The death of Mr. J. A. Cameron, the Standard correspondent, by a rifle-bullet which struck him that morning while he sat in the "zereba" eating his breakfast, was related in our Journal three or four weeks ago. His friend and comrade, our own Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, who was present on the spot, furnishes a Sketch of this deplorable incident, and one of the burial of Mr. Cameron, which took place the same day at Abou Kru. The latter Illustration shows the mournful procession, in which Mr. Burleigh, of the Daily Telegraph; Mr. Villiers, of the Graphic; Colonel Barrow, of the Hussars; and Lord Charles Beresford; together with Mr. Macdonald; Mr. Melton Prior, of the Illustrated London News; and Mr. H. S. Pearse, of the Daily News, bore sadly to the grave the body of Mr. Cameron. His grave was dug alongside those of two officers and Mr. St. Leger Herbert, of the Morning Post. Lord Charles Beresford read the Burial Service, which the circumstances rendered most impressive.

Our Special Artist contributes also the Sketch of a scene on the 21st at Metammeh, during the "reconnaissance in force," or first attempt to take that town, when Sir Charles Wilson was in command at the neighbouring camp of Gubat. The two steam-boats, with about three hundred Soudanese troops, and with guns on board, sent down by General Gordon from Khartoum, arrived in time to join in the attack, and were greeted by the troops with hearty cheers of welcome. Metammeh, however, proved to be more strongly defended than had been supposed, and the attempt to capture the place was abandoned.

The column going in boats up the Nile, which set forth under the command of the late General Earle, and which on the 10th inst. fought the battle of Kerbekan (or Dulka) where General Earle, Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, and Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny, were killed, has made its way through the Shukook Pass; and General Brackenbury's advanced guard was expected to reach Abou Hamed last Wednesday. Three Sketches by military correspondents illustrative of the advance of this force up the Nile from Korti, passing Merawi on the way, are engraved for our present Number. Two are drawn by the late Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny, of the 42nd (Black Watch) Royal Highlanders, whose obliging assistance with his pencil to the service of our Journal was acknowledged last week in the Memoir that accompanied his Portrait. These Sketches represent the Fort of Abou Dom, opposite Merawi, and the Nubian soldiers lent by the Mudir of Dongola, under command of Ahmed Effendi, marching through the country along the Nile. The third Sketch, by Lieutenant the Hon. Frank Colborne, of the Royal Irish Regiment, is that of the scene inside the "zereba" at Kobniat, near the Fourth Cataract, when General Earle's troops were at that place.

In the letters of General Gordon from Khartoum, some of which have this week been published in the Parliamentary papers, he mentions having issued paper money to defray his expenses in the town. We are enabled to present a facsimile of one of his notes bearing an Arabic inscription, which passed current for a value equal to about two shillings and sixpence. It is said that a private friend of Gordon at Cairo has received a letter from him, dated Dec. 14, in which he says, "All is up; I expect a catastrophe in ten days' time; it would not have been so if our people had kept me better informed as to their intentions." This letter may or may not be authentic; but Gordon could not have been aware of the frequently repeated attempts that had been made ever since last summer, to get letters from our Government authorities, civil and military, conveyed to him at any cost or trouble, by native messengers across the Desert.

The troops sent from England to compose the new army at Souakim, which Sir Gerald Graham is to command, had all taken their departure by the end of last week, including the Grenadier Guards, Coldstream Guards, and Scots Guards, who embarked at Gravesend. Sir Gerald Graham would be at Alexandria by the end of the present week. The Indian contingent of three thousand Sikh and other native soldiers, with an equal number of camp-followers, and with as many camels from India, is ready to be dispatched from Bombay and Kurrachee. Our Government has accepted the offer of a contingent from New South Wales, which will comprise a battalion of infantry 500 strong, and one battery of field artillery, with five sixteen-pounder guns properly horsed. The services of a second battery of artillery, although offered, have been declined. The London Gazette has published Royal proclamations directing that, in the case of forty-two corps at present or about to go on foreign service, soldiers entitled to pass into the Reserve shall continue with the regiment, and also embodying six battalions of militia infantry and two brigades of militia artillery. In order to relieve the difficulty supposed to be felt by the War Office, in providing soldiers for the ordinary sentry duties in the Metropolis, several of the Volunteer regiments in London have offered the services of a few of their members, especially on Saturdays and Sundays. The St. John's Ambulance Association, at the expense of Lady Brassey, has provided for instruction in "first aid to the sick and wounded," to be given to the Guards during their voyage by medical officers on board ship. A committee of ladies, the treasurer being Lady Rosebery, has been formed to supplement the army medical staff in succouring the sick and wounded in the Soudan.

GORDON'S GRAVE!

Shoulder to shoulder, we'll find him together,
Find where our hero is sleeping alone!
Far from his land of the mountain and heather,
Left on the sand, for his pillow a stone;
Pleading for aid, not a soul to protect him—
How our ears ring with his spirited cry!
Was it like England he loved to neglect him?
Fighting for life, and yet daring to die!

Sound the alarm! We will know where they laid him,
Search till we find the red spot where he fell.
Death to the cowards who basely betrayed him!
Left by the country he loved—but too well.
How did he die? Like a soldier, God bless him!
Sent out by England, her honour to save.
Let not our cry in his death-sleep distress him,
Ours be the glory to stand at his grave!

Hark to that shout! on the wings of the morning
Borne from the uttermost ends of the world!
Help comes from children, who, cowardice scorning,
Rush to our aid with their banners unfurled.
"Lift up your head! my disconsolate mother!
England has need of the strength of her sons,
Let us fall in to discover our brother,
Let us all stand, as of old, to our guns!"

Is there a page in our insular story
Fuller of heart, or of vigour, than this?
England, downhearted, re-leaps to her glory
Cheered by her children—refreshed by their kiss
False though the foe be, and foul though the weather,
Love lights a beacon of hope on the land!
On! to the grave of our hero together,
Shoulder to shoulder, and sword within hand!

FEB. 23, 1885. CLEMENT SCOTT.

This year's Navy Estimates show a net increase of nearly a million and a quarter, compared with last year's, due largely to the augmented ship-building vote. Provision is made for seventy-three vessels being under construction before the close of the financial year, against thirty-nine last year; but the amount of tonnage to be built is 28,052, compared with 20,679.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR REDVERS BULLER, K.C.M.G.

This gallant officer, who has succeeded the late Sir Herbert Stewart in command of the advanced force of Lord Wolseley's army beyond the Desert south of Korti, and is now conducting its strategic retreat from Gubat to Gakdul Wells, is no stranger to his countrymen accustomed to watch the military actions of the time. Sir Redvers Henry Buller is in the forty-fifth year of his age. He is a son of the late James Wentworth Buller, Esq., of Downes, Crediton, near Exeter, who long ago represented the county of Devon in Parliament. He entered the 60th Rifles in 1858, and served in the Chinese War; became Captain in 1870, and was in Colonel Wolseley's Red River Expedition in Canada; he served again under Sir Garnet Wolseley in the Ashantee War, and attained the rank of Major; was in the Kaffir War of 1878, and the Zulu War of 1879, where he won the Victoria Cross by distinguished valour; became Lieutenant-Colonel in the former year, and full Colonel in the latter. He held the office of Deputy Adjutant-General at head-quarters from 1874 to 1878. In the Egyptian campaign of 1882, Colonel Buller acted as head of the Intelligence Department, and obtained for his services the honour of knighthood; he had already been appointed, in 1874, a Companion of the Bath for his services in the Ashantee War. Sir Redvers Buller was next made Assistant Adjutant-General and one of the Queen's Aides-de-Camp. He was with Sir Gerald Graham's expedition to the Eastern Soudan last year, and was, for his performances in that campaign, promoted to the rank of Major-General. He is married to the widow of the late Hon. Greville Howard; Lady Audrey Buller is a daughter of the fourth Marquis Townshend.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Our Special Artist, Mr. W. Simpson, accompanying Major-General Sir Peter Lumsden, the British Commissioner for the survey and delimitation of the north-western boundary of Afghanistan towards Russian Turkestan, contributes the Sketch of a Durbar, or ceremonial reception, held at Kuhsan, the place where Sir Peter Lumsden and his official Staff were joined by the military escort sent from India under command of Colonel Ridgeway. Kuhsan, on the Heri-rud, is distant 767 miles from Quetta by the somewhat circuitous route which Colonel Ridgeway's troops, consisting of the 11th Bengal Lancers and the 20th Punjaub Infantry, with numerous camp-followers, were directed to take in order to avoid passing through the more populous districts of Afghanistan. They performed this march in fifty-seven days, reaching Kuhsan on Nov. 17, and were there met, in a day or two, by the British Commissioner and his party, who had travelled eastward through Persia and Khorassan. With Sir Peter Lumsden were Captain Barrow, his aide-de-camp; Mr. A. Condie Stephen, Assistant Commissioner; Nawab Mirza Hassan Ali Khan; Major Holdich, R.E., of the Survey Department; Captain Durand and Captain De Lassoe, attachés, and Mohammed Aslam Khan, native attaché, forming the Commissioner's staff; Mr. Simpson travelled in their company. The Kazi Saad-ud-din, representative of the Ameer Abdul-rahman Khan, the ruler of Afghanistan, with a camp of his own and an Afghan escort, had received Sir Peter Lumsden on entering the Afghan territory; the Governor of Herat also came to do honour to the British Commissioner; and this Durbar was part of the official ceremonies upon the occasion. The following is Mr. Simpson's account of this affair:—

"Major-General Sir Peter Lumsden arrived at Kuhsan on the morning of Nov. 19. The Indian camp had arrived there from the opposite direction two days before. Kuhsan is three marches from Herat, and the Governor of the province of that name came to Kuhsan to meet Sir Peter Lumsden. The Durbar took place in a large tent in the camp. The Governor's name is the Naib Ulhukmut Mohammed Sarwar Khan; he sat on the right of Sir Peter Lumsden, and the Kazi Saad-ud-din sat on the left. On the right of the Governor of Herat sat Mr. Alexander Condie Stephen, Assistant Commissioner, and in a similar position on the other side sat Colonel Ridgeway, another of the Assistant Commissioners. The Indian escort had come up in its long march from Nushki, under the charge of Colonel Ridgeway; and a number of officers connected with the expedition were present. Those in the foreground on the right, in picturesque uniforms, are the officers of the 11th Bengal Lancers. I also send a portrait of the Governor of Herat, who has long been a stanch adherent of the present ruler of Cabul. He bears a considerable resemblance to Henry VIII."

The Governor of the Russian Trans-Caspian dominions, General Komaroff, did not participate in the exchange of civilities on the frontier; and there has been no sign whatever, during two months since elapsed, of the approach of General Zelenoy, the Russian Boundary Commissioner, who was to have met Sir Peter Lumsden there for the joint execution of their important task. Our Special Artist visited the small Russian camp, which is situated about half-way between Old Sarakhs and the Heri-rud. It did not contain at that time over five or six hundred men. There were about three hundred or more of an infantry regiment, a squadron of Akhal Tekes, a squadron of Merv Turcomans, and some few infantry of a corps with Circassian costumes. They were encamped in kibitkas, and as yet they had made no fortifications. A Cossack dance, which Mr. Simpson witnessed in this camp, is the subject of his Sketch presented in our second Illustration, of which he writes the following account:—

"I have already related my visit to Old Sarakhs. At the moment I arrived, Ali Mardan Khan, the Governor of New Sarakhs, was paying a visit to General Komaroff, and was being entertained with a breakfast, which was followed by music and dancing by the soldiers. What I might call the troops of the line first sang and then added dancing; one of them had a violin, on which he played to them; then the Cossacks, as they are called—but they wear a Circassian costume, so I suppose they should be called Cossacks of the Caucasus—took part, and went through a number of performances. I send a Sketch of what seemed the most striking of the dances. A handsome fellow, with two daggers, danced and twisted about, flourishing the daggers as if he was going to kill either himself or someone else. He pointed the daggers to all points of his body; and these movements suggested the idea of self-murder, but I suppose that was not the true idea of the movements. He was much applauded for what he did. General Komaroff and Ali Mardan Khan, and the other officers, sat on chairs, looking on, outside of the kibitka, where they had breakfasted. Behind the dancer are other men of the same corps; one had a tambourine, and the others clapped their hands and sang while the dance went on. One of the officers of this corps stood there smoking a cigarette, and he is introduced into the Sketch. On the left of the picture are the more regular kind of Russian soldiers looking on." The news of this week mentions a rumoured addition of two thousand troops, with artillery, to the Russian garrison at Sarakhs. Sir Peter Lumsden has left Bala Murghab; and it is doubtful whether the Joint Commission will not be thrown over.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, Feb. 24.

To-day is the anniversary of a date famous in the history of Republican France, the anniversary of the Revolution of 1848. The Chamber of Deputies, after having spent another week over the discussion of the Cereals Bill without having yet arrived at a decision, determined yesterday to take a holiday on the occasion of this date; and this afternoon Ministers, Deputies, and the usual concourse of idlers repaired in large numbers to the Place Voltaire to be present at the unveiling of a statue of Ledru-Rollin, the famous Minister of the second French Republic, whose chief title to glory is that of having been the promoter of universal suffrage in the Chamber of Deputies. And so the statue unveiled to-day shows Ledru-Rollin with an electoral urn at his feet, and the orators, whatever might be their private opinion of this system of voting, all spoke in praise of it, for the simple reason that in a few months their re-election as deputies will depend on this very universal suffrage.

This morning several of the Paris journals publish accounts of a meeting of the Dynamite Directory held in Paris yesterday. There were eleven delegates present and some fifteen or twenty Fenians. The president was K. in E., whose real name is said to be John Morissey, and the secretary was Michael Flannery. The results of the discussions of the conclave were communicated to the Press in the form of a long resolution, claiming the independence of Ireland, and deciding to punish England "according to the law of retaliation, pursuing our ends by the same means and on a vaster scale, by the most vigorous and pitiless measures, by a system of simultaneous explosions in London and in the other cities, towns, and villages of England." An amendment recommending the destruction of the historical monuments of England by means of dynamite was not voted.

There is revolution in the air nowadays; but we have become so accustomed to revolutionary men and things that they have taken their place amongst the ordinary curiosities of the day. Last week, at the burial of Jules Vallès, the ex-members of the Commune of 1870 paraded before the crowd, and were looked upon almost with that kind of respect which used to salute the passage of the old "grognards" of the Grande Armée. To have been a member of the Commune has gradually come to be a title almost to honour and glory. The ex-Communard may aspire to all honours, even to Parliament. This week one of the heroes of the day is the septuagenarian old proscript and Communard Félix Pyat, who has written a new drama, which will be produced at the Ambigu Theatre to-night. M. Pyat's play, called "L'Homme de Peine," is a sort of protest against Zola's "Assommoir," or "Drink," which the Communard and apologist of regicide considers to be a calumny and travesty of the Parisian workman.

At the Eden Theatre, a new ballet, "Messalina," has been produced. All Paris and all the visitors to Paris will naturally go to see this spectacular pantomime, which is certainly the most superb display of scenery and costumes which has yet been made in Paris. The interest of course does not lie in the plot, but in the varied and agreeable mass movements of the hundreds of dancers, executed with marvellous regularity; and, above all, in the restoration—a pseudo-historical restoration, say the grumbling critics—of the splendours of ancient Rome. The scene of the Circus, with the tribune of the vestals, the tribune of the Emperor, and the combats of the gladiators in the arena, is simply magnificent. The Roman "orgie," the gardens of Luculkus, and the apotheosis of Cæsar in the Forum, with the march-past of the legions, the cavalry, the elephants, and the picturesque artillery of the epoch, are sights to be seen and remembered.

The question whether the fortifications of Paris are to be demolished or not has been decided in the negative against the majority of the Municipal Council. The Superior Committee of National Defence, composed of Generals of all arms, has found the arguments of the Municipal Council insufficient. Paris is not embarrassed in her development by the fortifications, says the committee, inasmuch as inside those limits there are vast open spaces, vineyards, pasture land, and even wheat-fields! From the military point of view, the Superior Committee consider the fortifications absolutely necessary, inasmuch as it was, thanks to this enceinte, that the Germans were stopped in 1870 during 135 days. The Germans failed to force these walls, and the city only succumbed to famine. It is worthy of notice that this decision to maintain the fortifications of Paris was taken by the Superior Committee unanimously.

The obelisk erected as a monument to General Washington was unveiled with imposing ceremonies in Washington on Saturday last. The obelisk has been thirty-seven years building, and is the highest monument in the world, 555 ft. high, and 55 ft. square at the base. It contains 82,000 tons of grey granite. The cost has been 1,187,000 dols. It stands on the spot approved by Washington himself in 1791, and can be seen anywhere within a radius of twenty miles. Inside is an iron staircase leading to the summit, and also a steam-lift.

NEWS FROM NICE.—With the exception of a very few wet and cold days, the weather is again splendid. Not a flake of snow has fallen. The sun shines almost perpetually, and the influence of its warm rays makes life enjoyable to all, and more especially to those who have by impaired health sought its influence.
There are no epidemics, and the average mortality of the city in 1884 was less per mille than London and many fashionable towns in England.
The streets, roads, and sewers are constantly cleansed and disinfected, and watered from the mountain stream of the Vesubie. There are three English doctors and physicians in practice here—viz., Messrs. West, Wakefield, and Sturge, and they will be happy to communicate with any intending visitors as to the healthfulness of the town.
The effects of the recent storm (the like of which has been unknown for thirty-five years) were comparatively trifling, and repaired in twenty-four hours. In some few low-lying rooms and cellars, near the Fish Market, the wash from the spent waves had entered, but this was soon pumped out by the firemen and dairy.
Visitors are hastening in increasing numbers, as is their wont at this season, and the approach of Carnival, which report says will be the best on record. The Municipal Theatre will open immediately, and the Théâtre Français, of which Mr. Cortelazzo continues the able Director, has several Star Artists for the Opera Comique, and an excellent Troupe de Comédie.
The Carnival and Regatta will be fully announced with other fêtes.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, Feb. 25.

Last Thursday's return of the Bank of England was what is termed a good return, that is, as regards the resources of the central institution, they having been greatly augmented during the week. The reserve showed an increase of £1,045,486, of which £296,000 only was caused by arrivals of gold from abroad, the remainder being therefore due to diminished circulation of notes and coin at home. So moderate, however, has been the demand for discounts, that quotations for cashing three-months' bills have ranged from 3⅞ to 3½ per cent, while some of the Indian banks have negotiated their paper at fully ½ per cent less than these rates. For short loans the charges have fluctuated sharply, it being difficult at times to find borrowers at 3 per cent, while on other occasions 4 per cent has been given. The dividend payments by the home railways fully account for these fluctuations. With regard to the Stock Markets, political affairs have continued to be the motive power, and the influence has been adverse. Rumours regarding Russian designs on Herat have been particularly active, and some have shown great ingenuity on the part of the authors. At one time Consols could be bought for a fraction over £98 per £100 stock. Foreign Government loans and Home railways have also receded, the latter to an important extent. Below will be found some remarks on the causes serving to depress Metropolitan and Metropolitan District stocks, while London and Chatham and South-Eastern issues have receded sharply on the unfriendly relations existing between the two undertakings, the latter being also influenced by the unsatisfactory attempts to place an issue of second preference stock. A favourable feature has been the further recovery in American railways. This is due to the better tone prevailing at New York. Canadian have been weak, and there has been a fall in Mexican railway stocks.

Were additional evidence necessary to prove the desirableness of closer union between the Metropolitan and Metropolitan District Railway Companies, it is abundantly afforded by the remarks contained in the last half-yearly reports of the two undertakings. Most home railway stocks have suffered depreciation during the current year; but in the stocks of the companies above referred to, the fall has been particularly marked, and much of this adverse movement must be ascribed to the unsatisfactory working of the Inner Circle line of railway, concerning which such favourable results had been anticipated. It was only to be expected that some difficulties would have to be encountered at first, but it is quite evident that these difficulties have been greatly enhanced by the action of those having the control of affairs. Reference was made in this column a couple of weeks ago to the disappointment expressed by the directors of the Metropolitan Company at the working of the Inner Circle, which they attributed largely to the Metropolitan District running extra trains. The report of the latter company has now been issued, and in their turn the directors accuse the Metropolitan Company of throwing obstacles in the way of smooth working. "The difficulties incident to initiating a service so novel and complicated, were unhappily increased by diversity of views between the partners; and although the board do not desire to allege wilful obstruction against the Metropolitan Company, they were bound to resist the pretension of that company to conduct this service in such a manner as to sacrifice to their separate interest the local traffic of the District Company between the east and west stations of their line." Only 4 per cent per annum is to be paid on the preference stock of the District Company, against the full 5 for the second half of 1883.

The committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Railway Share Trust and Railway Debenture Trust Companies have issued their report, in which they state that all charges affecting the character of the directors or officials of the two companies appear to be wholly unfounded, adding that the statements as to capital, reserve, and revenue available for dividend are substantially correct. The committee recommend the addition of one or two gentlemen to the boards, that a limited number of directors should be appointed for each week to act as a committee, that no transactions between members of the board and the companies should take place, and that in the Debenture Trust Company's report a valuation should be given of the securities upon the same principle as that adopted in the Railway Share Trust Company. A dividend at the rate of 4 per cent per annum is to be paid on the shares of the Railway Debenture Trust Company, making for the year 5 per cent.

At a meeting of Convocation of the London University, held on Tuesday, a resolution was passed, on the motion of Lord Justice Fry, approving of the scheme for establishing a Teaching University for London.

At the meeting of the members of the London School Board on the 19th inst., the debate was resumed on the motion of the chairman of the Finance Committee, that as it appeared that £1,106,138 is required to meet the deficiency in the school fund in order to enable the Board to satisfy liabilities up to March, 1886, it be referred to the committee to apportion the said amounts amongst the different parts of the metropolis, and the amendment of Mr. Lyulph Stanley to reduce the amount of the precept by £60,000, the estimate on account of the expenditure for school maintenance being excessive. After an animated discussion the amendment was carried by 24 against 19. The question as amended was then referred to the finance committee, with instructions to consult with the school management committee, and to bring up an amended estimate.—After a long discussion on Saturday it was decided to abandon the proposal to erect a new school at Green-terrace, Islington, principally on the ground that the school was not required.—A public meeting in connection with the opening of the new Board School in Princess-terrace, Regent's Park, was held on the 20th inst. in the school-room. This school is the 370th built by the London School Board, and accommodation is now provided for 339,994 children. The new building accommodates 804 children—viz., 240 boys, 240 girls, and 324 infants. The area of the site is 31,825 square feet. The total cost of site and building is £16,833.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

Emile Augier, of the French Academy, would scarcely recognise his comedy "Les Fourchambault" if he were one evening to step into the Court Theatre and see "The Denhams." And yet, in the present condition of public taste, Mr. James Albery cannot be blamed for what he has done. Had he followed Augier into the paths of literature, he would probably have been pooh-pooked by the commercial manager, sneered at by the superficial critic, and ignored by the undiscriminating public. In an age professedly educated, there never was a time when commonplace was so encouraged on the stage. The object of a modern dramatist is to make an audience laugh at every opportunity and at all hazards. Now, "Les Fourchambault" is, in its original form, a serious work. It treats with convincing skill one of the most solemn problems of life. A woman, trusting to a man's honour as well as his love, is wretchedly deceived, and, after a gallant struggle with misfortune, lives to repay her injury with a noble generosity and a sincere self-sacrifice. It is a story as true of England of to-day as it was true of France when it was written. A governess is cast upon the world with a son to support, and the doors of society shut against her. She has suffered for her faith in man's honour. She trains her boy to business; he becomes the richest merchant in the city; and he lives a life so honourable and upright that he is able to save his father from ruin and to check his father's son in a course of deplorable infamy. There is not one passage in "Les Fourchambault" that is not true of society of to-day. There are young governesses still open to temptation; there are younger sons so vicious that they think nothing of compromising an innocent woman's character; there are women like Madame Fourchambault, who spread scandal that they know to be false for their own worldly ends; and there are men, thank goodness, like John Goring, upright and honourable enough to love their mothers nobly, and to appreciate the excellence of a pure, good woman. It is held, however, in the circles of the stage, that these well-drawn pictures of sin and its consequence are unadvisable. It is said to be immoral to draw black lines as well as to leave white ones. The truth is never more hideous than when it is presented on the stage. The mere fact that the tale is true outrages modern society against it.

So Mr. Albery, like a clever man, has skated boldly over his thin ice. He has misrepresented almost every character and motive so as not to shock any susceptibilities. He has cut down the drama and advanced the comedy; and that is exactly what the public requires. They don't want to think, but to laugh. The theatre is not for reflection, but for ridicule. The Mrs. Denham of this most artificial play is like no woman who ever existed. She is a machine manufactured for letting off jests. Her daily dialogue is peppered with extravagance and exotic epigram. She is funny, but she is not natural. Art is strained to allow of the existence of such a woman. Mrs. Denham is equally absurd when her husband is in a henpecked state of prosperity as when he is in the despondency of despair. All the serious scenes in the play pause with astonishment whilst Mrs. Denham explodes her fireworks. This is what the public demands, but it is not art. The reason of this sublime solecism is not far to find. Mrs. John Wood plays Mrs. Denham, and that is quite enough. The play and its meaning may go hang; but they want Mrs. John Wood, just as they want Mr. Hill elsewhere. They make people laugh, and that is quite enough. Their personality is everything. Dramatists who love art for itself cannot stand against these personal successes. Mrs. John Wood will carry through "The Denhams," just as she drew all London with the "Milliner's Bill." Her forte is low comedy, and the people at large like low comedy far better than high comedy. But even low comedy of this artificial and unreal kind is not so lasting in effect as most people imagine. It amuses, but it fatigues. It goes in at one ear and out at the other. It would be strange if the acting of Mr. John Clayton as John Goring—serious, truthful, and heartfelt as it is—did not prevail, in the end, over Mrs. Wood's brilliancy and inimitable fun. We feel for the one: we laugh with the other. When the temporary exhilaration of Mr. Albery's wit, as delivered by Mrs. Wood, has died away, our thoughts revert, not unpleasantly, to the fine faithfulness of John Goring and to the sweet trust of his gentle mother. The question is whether Miss Lydia Foote is not a suspicion too gentle and yielding. Mrs. Goring is, after all, a woman of strong character. She has made her son's fortune by her invincible determination. She can rule as well as love. Her face, to quote those lovely lines in the Atalanta in Calydon of Swinburne, "is marred with fire of many tears." The pathos of resignation should be shown in the countenance of Mrs. Goring. It was here that the performance of Miss Louise Moodie was so excellent. Miss Lydia Foote is very charming, but too much the "little mother" of ordinary domestic life. She is sweet, but she lacks character. Miss Marion Terry is delightful as Haidée Burnside, the second governess in the story exposed to the temptation of a dissolute man. She has caught the echo of her sister's winning ways and gracefulness, and she has a great measure of that peculiar Terry charm that no one yet has properly put into words. Mr. Conway is most of all to be pitied. He has a character that is inexplicable. His vice is so watered down that it is tasteless. His relation to the story is incomprehensible. We can understand the Leopold of the original, who flaunts his unpalatable doctrines and looks upon governesses as the natural prey of rich men. Such a creature is detestable, but human. But a Fawley Denham, who acts as Mr. Conway is made to act, is incomprehensible to the ordinary student of character. Mr. Conway has had as many bad parts to play as any young man of his time, and he performs his disagreeable task extremely well. No actor in the world could make head or tail of Fawley Denham. He has been smothered in the cause of false morality. Mr. Arthur Cecil can never be excused for refusing the character of Mr. Denham, which is essential to the well-being of the play, for the sake of the Rev. Lord William Whitehead, who is an excrescence. The Church and its ministers are nowadays, strange to say, the most popular targets for public scorn and ridicule. But this feeble Mr. Whitehead is a thin, ill-drawn character at the best; whereas Mr. Denham, indifferently acted in the present cast, would well have suited so clever an actor as Mr. Cecil. The play almost broke down at the outset through the failure of Mr. Denham to tell with point and earnestness a most important story. It was the easiest thing in the world to do; but, as it was ill done, the audience immediately ascribed the blame to the author instead of to the actor. How often is it that we hear "too long," "too tedious," "too talky," "too much dialogue," when, instead, it should be "too dragged," "too laboured," and "too indifferently played"? The modern actor, when called upon to deliver a sentence of more than a line and a half, breaks down, and the author is blamed. I should like him to hear Coquelin, of the Français, deliver a speech of three pages in the "Denise" of Dumas. It is a masterpiece of descriptive elocution, and it wearies nobody.

We are often told that audiences in the days of our ancestors damned plays pretty severely; that there was a power in the pit, and much discriminating opinion in the boxes. How was it, then, that Sheridan Knowles escaped? Lucky for this verbose Irish gentleman and actor that he produced his plays before a pit of 1832, and not one of 1885. Fancy the groan of disappointment, after following the five acts of a play so tiresome as this, with which Master Walter's coup de théâtre would be received! Listen to this complicated rigmarole, when the author has got into a tangle of complication concerning the marriage of Julia to her faithful Clifford, she having contracted to marry Lord Rochdale. "Heaven did send a son to bless the heir. Heaven took its gift away. He died! His father died; and Master Walter, the unsightly agent of his Lordship there—the Hunchback whom your Lordship would have stripped of his agency—is now the Earl of Rochdale!" And, to make confusion worse confounded, the Hunchback is Julia's father! Miss Mary Anderson is not able to throw any new light on this stilted, artificial, and unnatural play. It had been hoped that a fresh intelligence would have redeemed it from commonplace. But the echo of a past tradition rings in the ears of this pretty and graceful lady. She has copied the manner of antiquity without imbibing the spirit of the great actresses of the past. The trick of gaining an effect is studied; but, strange to say, the effect never comes. It is not difficult to discover the reason of this disappointment. Miss Mary Anderson never truly feels the passions with which Julia is credited. She never is really enamoured of country life, or attracted by Clifford, or disappointed by his rejection, or maddened at his reserve. She studies Julia by means of tradition, the stage, the footlights, the echoes of the past, and not by the light of her own intelligence. It is an artificial part, and, as interpreted, it falls flat upon the modern spectator, who will not accept a copy for an original, or insincerity for truth. Miss Mary Anderson, in her lovely dresses, makes a charming picture as Julia; but it is open to doubt whether, five minutes after the curtain fell, one single mind was impressed with the value of one single scene in which she had laboured for success. There was but one ray of intelligence in the whole play. Mr. Arthur Stirling's Master Walter was the work of a good actor and a thoughtful man. In the old days, such a part would have fallen to Mr. Thomas Stuart, of the Adelphi; but how much brighter, more vivid, more human and natural the Master Walter of Arthur Stirling, who uses his experience with such judgment! He knows how such parts have been played, but he is no parrot. His method is sound, his intelligence is keen, and the audience appreciates the result because in one instance at least the play is lifted out of the slough of unimaginative tradition. The scenes between Helen and Modus always go well, no matter how they are played. A ray of comedy is a relief after this fog of fustian. There have been Helens who have held the part with a lighter hand than Miss Pateman, and Moduses who have approached the character with less diffidence; but all felt inclined to say, "For this relief much thanks." Miss Pateman, always a clever actress, had to work desperately hard to enliven a dull and depressed house, and her very labour gave to the performance a harsher outline than she probably intended, but the call for Miss Pateman and Mr. Herbert Standing was very hearty and sincere. Mr. Terriss battled bravely with Sir Thomas Clifford, but it was up-hill work to make love to a lady who was clearly thinking of anything else in the world but Clifford.

There will be no opportunity this week to discuss "Junius; or, the Household Gods," by the late Lord Lytton, to be produced at the Princess's Theatre by Mr. Wilson Barrett on Thursday; nor to describe the pleasure doubtless to be afforded to the habitués of the Haymarket by the revived "Masks and Faces," fixed for Saturday; but in the next Number, these and various other interesting events shall receive due attention. It never rains but it pours in the theatrical world. C. S.

The one-hundredth performance of Mr. Augustus Harris's pantomime, "Whittington and his Cat," by far the most successful of his productions at Drury Lane Theatre, will be given this (Saturday) afternoon. This year Mr. Harris, instead of devoting one afternoon to a performance for the poor children of London, will during the run of the pantomime invite about five thousand or six thousand poor children on different afternoons.

At the Criterion Theatre this (Saturday) morning there is to be an amateur performance, under the special patronage of the Princess of Wales (who has graciously signified her intention to be present), in aid of the funds for the restoration of Wolferton church, near Sandringham. The comedy by Douglas Jerrold entitled "The White Milliner," and an original operetta, by Lady Arthur Hill, entitled "The Lost Husband," will be played.

Mr. Robert Ord's dramatic recital and concert will be given at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, next Wednesday evening.

Mr. Edwin Drew's annual dramatic and musical entertainment is announced for Monday evening, March 9, in the Banqueting-Room, St. James's Hall.

The programme of the Royal Victoria Hall for March announces excellent Ballad Concerts to be given each Thursday in the month, under the direction, respectively, of Messrs. Layton and Sinclair Dunn, Signor Gilardoni, and Madame Jeanetta Price. The Science Lectures will be continued on Tuesdays; that on the 24th inst. will be given by Commander Cameron, whose lecture last month drew such a crowded house. The Variety and Temperance entertainments will be exceptionally good, and will take place on Mondays, Fridays, and Saturdays, as usual.

The third annual ball for founding a national Italian hospital in London took place on Tuesday at Willis's Rooms.

Under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury and the distinguished patronage of Princess Louise, the Marquis of Lorne, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke and Duchess of Wellington, the Duke of Westminster, the Duchess of Manchester, and other distinguished persons, an Industrial Exhibition will be held for three weeks in May or June next, at the drill-hall of the 2nd Tower Hamlets' Rifle Volunteers, which has been kindly given for the purpose by Lieutenant-Colonel Donald Munro and the officers. The working and poorer classes of the East-End are invited to send in specimens of their handiwork for exhibition, and to those whose exhibits show the greatest merit prizes will be given.

The chaplain of Westminster Hospital requests those who have papers and periodicals which have been read, to spare them for the patients in Westminster Hospital. Reading is generally the chief resource of those confined for weeks or months to their beds, and such literature, easy to read and light to the hand, is found specially suitable to the sick. Old, warm clothes, too, are most valuable for patients whom a Samaritan fund sends into the country, as they are frequently found to be lamentably deficient in clothing. If any persons who sympathise with the sick poor will send occasional parcels of these desiderata to the Rev. H. Fase, Chaplain of Westminster Hospital, S.W., they may be sure that their gifts will be gratefully acknowledged, warmly appreciated, and fully utilised.

FINE ARTS.

The value of the old Flemish and Italian pictures on view at 48, Pall-mall, must, in a great measure, depend upon the history attaching to them—for in real beauty they are sadly wanting. To antiquarians and to erudite picture collectors the works of the early masters have especial value when their authenticity can be ascertained; but it is difficult to understand that the products of "Schools" whether of Van Orley or Lucas Van Leyden, or even of Memling, can have much attraction, unless it be that of beauty of design or composition. In the present collection, a number of the works—of which the majority seem to us to bear the stamp of German workmanship—are boldly attributed to Mabuse, Van der Meire (of Ghent), and Roger Van der Weyden, amongst northern masters; and to Gentile Bellini, Filippo Lippi, and Ghirlandajo amongst southerners. One of the most successful, however, is a full-length figure of a "Lady in Black Dress" (25), of which nothing more is said than it is the outcome of the "School of Vandyck." It has considerable grace, and the dark tones of the background are managed with no slight skill. A "Mater Dolorosa" (2), attributed to Roger Van der Weyden; a "Presentation" (32), of the "School of Verona"; and a "Crucifixion" (3), said to be by that rare master De Blès, the "Glory of Liége," are perhaps the works which will attract attention.

In the dozen water-colour drawings, by Mr. Frank Dicksee, illustrative of the tragedy of "Romeo and Juliet," now on view at Messrs. Vokins', Great Portland-street, the artist has happily given rein to his own fancy, instead of relying on his reminiscences of the two recent revivals of the play, which have attracted so much attention. The actor or actress has to rely upon broad treatment and general effect; but the painter has the more difficult task of catching the poet's passing fancy, and stamping it with the mask of his own interpretation. The series of illustrations by Mr. Dicksee are not arranged with any regard to the development of the story, but are rather studies of various incidents in the lives of the principal characters. They begin and end with Friar Laurence: in the first he is leading the way from his cell to the chapel where the two lovers are to be made one, and in the last he is alone on his way to gather the herbs in which "such grace doth lie." This latter is one of the gems of the series, for Mr. Dicksee's art lends itself more readily to the expression of inward feeling than of boisterous movement. The scene in Juliet's chamber (5), for instance, is far more in sympathy with the artist than the "Death of Tybalt" (3) or the street riot between the rival Factions" (9). "The Tomb-Scene" (8) recalls, perhaps, recent stage arrangements, and is not a little marred by the disproportionate length of Romeo's body; and a similar disregard of proportion is seen in "The Invitation" (10), where Romeo's legs occupy too much of the space. These are, however, but slight blemishes in a very delightful series of Shakspeare illustrations; and one can only hope that Mr. F. Dicksee will pursue a line so happily inaugurated. The original drawings are in "black and white"—in the more liberal sense applied to that term—and will be produced in photogravure, of which excellent specimens are hung beside the drawings themselves.—In addition to this series, there is a very excellent collection of water colours in the rooms, comprising landscapes by Thorne Waite, W. Bennett, and Birket Foster; sea-pieces by O. W. Brierley, E. Duncan, and H. G. Hine; figure-pieces, J. F. Lewis, Edwin Ball, and F. Tayler; and some excellent architectural drawings by S. Read, B. Foster, and Louis Haghe.

The Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours will open their exhibition on April 27, the private view being fixed for the 25th. The receiving day for works of outsiders will be March 30, and for those of members April 1.

The fifty-ninth exhibition of the Royal Scottish Academy is open to the public. Landscapes form the strongest feature of the exhibition, and the collection of water colours is excellent.

At a meeting held in Edinburgh on the 20th inst., presided over by Bailie Clark, it was resolved to hold an international exhibition in that city, in the summer of 1886, of industry, science, and art, and a committee was appointed to carry out the details.

A vacancy in the list of Associates of the Royal Academy has been caused by the retirement of the well-known Scotch painter, Mr. Robert Thorburn, whose work in miniature painting gained him considerable fame in earlier days. He was elected A.R.A. in 1848.

At "Ten o'Clock" on Friday night, the 20th, Mr. Whistler began at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, an address for which the hour was made oddly enough to serve as title. The speaker's theme was Art, its past history, ancient and modern. He passed in rapid review, indulging on the way in humorous sallies and reflections more or less philosophic, and concluding with remarks upon its present condition and future prospects. In the course of his lecture, he aimed some sharp arrows at amateurs, æsthetes, and the votaries of the realistic school, observing, with reference to the doctrines inculcated by the last-named painters, that to tell an artist to take Nature as she is, is like telling a musician to sit upon his piano. Mr. Whistler also took occasion to dilate upon the rules of sound judgment in art, as well as upon the injuries which had resulted to public taste from a disregard of those rules. He bestowed many of his most poignant sarcasms upon the "unattached writers," whom he described as the middlemen of art. There was a large and brilliant audience, at whose hands the lecturer experienced a very favourable reception.

The imports of live stock and fresh meat to Liverpool from American and Canadian ports landed during the past week at the former port were unusually small, amounting to 626 cattle, 6058 quarters of beef, and 610 carcases of mutton.

As the result of a private conference at the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor has issued an appeal to the public for funds to assist families rendered destitute in various parts of the metropolis through depression of trade.

The Dutch Club in London celebrated its annual festival last Saturday night at the Criterion, under the presidency of the Dutch Minister, Count Van Bylandt. The company included Mr. Alma Tadema, R.A., and many English friends of the Dutch living in London.

A violent tempest, accompanied by storms of snow and hail, visited the west of Scotland last Saturday evening. On the Highland Railway a train was imbedded in the drift for the night. Considerable injury was done to shipping, and several accidents are reported.

The second part of the report of the Boundary Commissioners relating to England and Wales was issued last Saturday. It fully explains the principles upon which the Commissioners have been guided both in counties and boroughs, and states that eighty-one local inquiries have been held by sub-commissioners.

THE BATTLE OF ABOU KLEA: RE
DRAWN BY R. C.

REPULSE OF THE ARAB CHARGE.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The Opposition attack upon the Government virtually began on the day the Session was resumed. It was boldly and vigorously opened in his most cutting style by the Marquis of Salisbury on Thursday week in the House of Lords, which was well attended, the Princess of Wales, the Marchioness of Salisbury, and the Countess of Rosebery being among the ladies noticed in the balconies. The Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge occupied their accustomed seats on the front cross-bench; and it was observed that the Marquis of Ripon made his first reappearance in the House since his return from India. Earl Granville lost no time in placing upon the table fresh papers on the Egyptian Troubles. At the outset he had the satisfaction of announcing the approaching successful issue of the negotiations with the Powers for the settlement of the financial difficulty in Egypt. There the satisfaction of the Foreign Secretary ended. The noble Earl pronounced a glowing eulogy on the late General Gordon, whose mission to Khartoum he proceeded to justify, as he likewise did the dispatch of the fruitless Gordon-rescue expedition up the Nile. Finally, Lord Wolseley was given carte blanche "to check the advance of the Mahdi, and for that purpose to destroy his power at Khartoum." Then came Lord Salisbury's opportunity. The noble Marquis made good use of it. With his habitual clearness of articulation and exemplary distinctness of thought and of speech, he gave the House a foretaste of the vigour with which he intended to assail the Government when the hour should come to deliver his formal indictment against the Ministry. Lord Salisbury lamented the loss of "our Christian hero"; but pertinently added—

> We wish to know that these exertions, which will cost us so much in precious treasure and far more in precious blood, will not be absolutely thrown away, and that we shall not retire from Egypt leaving behind no record of our presence except the mischief and the confusion we have wrought, and the bones of the unhappy soldiers who have been slain.

The roll-call of the dead was further increased on the following day, when it was the melancholy duty of Lord Morley to substantiate the report of Major-General Sir Herbert Stewart's death, in deploring which the Under-Secretary for War also seized the occasion to lament the loss of another gallant Commander in the Soudan, General Earle.

There are necessarily wheels within wheels in the Imperial policy of the Government of so extended an Empire as ours. It is possible that, if the truth were known, a graver reason than the initiation of military operations on a larger scale in the Soudan led the Ministry to announce yesterday week the embodiment of the Militia.

When the Commons reassembled on Thursday week, the House itself naturally became the subject of much interest at first. It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. Obviously, the glaziers and upholsterers had profited by the recent dynamite explosion within the House. After a glance at the plain ground-glass panes that temporarily filled the places of the shattered stained-glass windows, the eye rested with some degree of pleasure upon the new green leather benches, which quite brightened the inconveniently small and badly ventilated chamber. The gaily becloaked Sheriffs of London merited a vote of thanks, soon after prayers, for infusing a little colour into the usually dry proceedings. In brilliant attire, they boldly took their stand at the bar, and formally petitioned that the City should not be deprived of the two seats doomed by the Redistribution Bill. Clear as a bell was the voice of the spokesman Sheriff.

Careworn, and his natural pallor seemingly enhanced by his being in mourning, Mr. Gladstone appeared to be the personification of anxiety as he took his seat on the Treasury bench, receiving as he did so but a very faint tribute of cheering from Ministerialists. Ex-Ministers on the front Opposition bench, on the other hand, looked in the best of spirits. They manifestly hoped power was almost within their grasp once more. There was the old familiar ring in the lusty cheers which greeted Sir Stafford Northcote when he lifted his ordinarily mild voice above its usual compass, and gave notice of his Resolution of Censure. Comparatively faint-hearted were the Liberal cheers in response. Hence, it was not surprising that it was in his most subdued tones Mr. Gladstone explained the present military situation in the Soudan. Quite conversationally did the Prime Minister state that the policy of "the evacuation of the Soudan by Egypt" had undergone no change; that the fall of Khartoum, with the lamented death of General Gordon, entailed new military duties, which would render it incumbent on Lord Wolseley to "overthrow the power of the Mahdi" either at once or in the autumn; and that, to ensure the success of the undertaking, reinforcements had been sent to Souakim, to take action against Osman Digna and to lay a railway line to Berber. The Premier added that both General Gordon and Lord Wolseley had commenced with peaceful overtures to the Mahdi, and that, though the present position did not admit of a repetition of such negotiations, the Government would not decline to receive any message from the Soudan. Sir Stafford Northcote's apt commentary on Mr. Gladstone's statement was followed by the bringing forward of the Redistribution Bill, precedence for which was secured by the Premier at the next sitting of the House.

Sir Stafford Northcote spoke with so much spirit, and with such point and good feeling on the re-opening night, when he completely made himself the mouthpiece of the House by his earnest tribute to General Gordon and his patriotic praise of the public spirit shown by Australia in offering to send Volunteers to the Soudan, that considerable disappointment was occasioned by the lame speech he made on Monday in introducing the following Motion of Censure:—

> That a humble Address be presented to the Queen, humbly representing to her Majesty that the course pursued by her Majesty's Government in respect to the affairs of Egypt and the Soudan has involved a great sacrifice of valuable lives and a heavy expenditure without any beneficial result, and has rendered—that is, the course pursued by the Government has rendered—it imperatively necessary, in the interests of the British Empire and of the Egyptian people, that her Majesty's Government should distinctly recognise, and take decided measures to fulfil, the special responsibility now incumbent on them to assure a good and stable Government to Egypt and to those portions of the Soudan which are necessary to its security.

The Leader of the Opposition raised his voice considerably; but, in reciting the alleged sins of omission and commission on the part of the Government, culminating in the death of General Gordon and the fall of Khartoum, he failed to furnish an alternative policy. Mr. John Morley, appropriately speaking from the corner seat generally occupied by Mr. John Bright, improved his Parliamentary reputation by the lofty and ably-reasoned speech in which he moved an amendment to the effect that the House regretted the decision of the Government to employ the forces of the Crown to overthrow the Mahdi.

Mr. Gladstone, throwing off the reserve of the first night, rose on Monday to the height of the situation, and in his most trenchant and earnest manner marshalled his arguments antagonistic to both the resolution and the amendment. After a magnificent eulogium of General Gordon, he boldly claimed that the safety of Egypt had been maintained by the military operations in the Soudan, and that the slave trade had been checked. As a matter of course, the Premier traversed much of the ground he rapidly covered on the Thursday. The gist of his reply to Sir Stafford Northcote was that his attack was only a repetition of the case brought by the right hon. Baronet against the Government in May last. Mr. Gladstone did not vouchsafe any new disclosure of policy; but cheerily appealed, in a stirring and animated peroration, to the Majority to accord the Ministry a vote of confidence. Should they be honoured by such a vote, the right hon. gentleman said in conclusion—

> We shall endeavour to maintain the honour of the British name, to fulfil every engagement into which we have entered, directly or constructively, and to discharge every duty, onerous though it may be, which is inseparable from a crisis of this kind in the possessions of a great and a world-wide Empire (Ministerial cheers).

It was greatly to be regretted that the continuation of the debate on Tuesday was delayed for some hours by the Parnell group of Irish members, one of the most irreconcilable of whom, Mr. William O'Brien, who has an ungovernable native tendency to white heat and obstinacy, had to be suspended for a week for the mulish persistence with which he sought to obtrude a local Irish matter on the attention of the House. The Speaker's power of Closure had also to be put in force to arrest the clamour of the Irish Party, which, incapable of ruling its own temper, sets up to Home-Rule Ireland. After the farce, the drama was resumed. Sir John Lubbock offered the Government some rational advice, which was clearly not thrown away upon Mr. Trevelyan, who made an excellent speech, and said all that could be said in justification of the military operations, which were rendered necessary, he said, to ensure the safety of Lord Wolseley's troops. He added, that the Government would not object to negotiate, by-and-by, with the Mahdi. The next noteworthy speech of the evening was Mr. Goschen's. That right hon. gentleman distinctly said he would vote against the Government unless they made a more satisfactory statement as to what they intended to do in the Soudan. Adjourned till Thursday, the debate in the Commons is expected to result in a narrow majority for the Ministry on Friday night.

In the Lords, the Marquis of Salisbury may not improbably secure a victory over the Government, as he has done before. But it appears that the adverse votes of the Lords have no effect whatever upon the Government.

OBITUARY.

CAMPBELL OF ISLAY.

John Francis Campbell, of Islay, F.G.S., chief of the well-known and highly allied family of Islay and Schawfield, late one of the Grooms-in-Waiting to the Queen, died at Cannes on the 17th inst. He was born Dec. 29, 1822, the only son of the late Mr. Walter Frederick Campbell, M.P. for Argyllshire, by his first wife, Lady Eleanor Charteris, daughter of the seventh Earl of Wemyss, and was apparently heir to the beautiful estate of Islay, but that property was sold by his father. He inherited, however, the representation of a race still held in honour and esteem by the Highlanders. Devoted to the study of geology, and other scientific pursuits, he was also a learned Gaelic scholar, and passed much of his time in collecting by the firesides of the Scottish peasants traditions and stories in the Gaelic language. His father married, for his second wife, Catherine, daughter of Mr. Stephen Thomas Cole, and niece of the Earl of Derby, by whom he had one son, Captain Walter Douglas Somerset Campbell (who succeeded his brother, whose death we record, as Groom-in-Waiting, and is now Campbell of Islay), as well as four daughters—Mrs. Bromley Davenport, of Baginton; Lady Mackenzie, of Gairloch; Mrs. West; and the Countess Granville. Lady Charlotte Campbell, grandmother of the late Campbell of Islay, daughter of John, fifth Duke of Argyll, was one of the most famed beauties of her time, and a popular authoress, under the name of her second marriage, Bury.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Mrs. Catherine Hume-Rothery, youngest daughter of the late Joseph Hume, the well-known M.P.

Mrs. Lowell, wife of the United States Minister, at the American Legation in London, on the 19th inst.

Lady Mary Lumsden, widow of Mr. James Grant Lumsden, H.E.I.C.C.S., and sister of the present Earl of Stamford, on the 15th inst., aged seventy-one.

Augusta, Lady Platt, widow of the Hon. Sir Thomas Joshua Platt, Baron of the Exchequer, on the 16th inst., at 61, Queen's-gardens, in her eighty-ninth year.

Louisa, Lady Burrard, widow of Admiral Sir Charles Burrard, second and last Baronet, of Lymington, and daughter of Sir Henry Lushington, Bart., on the 17th inst., at Holmfield, Lyndhurst, aged eighty-three.

The Rev. George Francis Coke, M.A., of Lemore, Herefordshire, Vicar of Titley, a descendant of George Coke, Bishop of Hereford, one of the twelve Bishops imprisoned by Parliament, on the 13th inst., at the Priory, Titley.

The Hon. Emily Noel Hill, second daughter of Richard, fourth Lord Berwick, and sister of the fifth Baron and of the present Peer, on the 14th inst., at Coton Manor, near Shrewsbury, aged seventy-seven years.

Captain Cecil Godschall Johnson, Knight of the Orders of San Fernando and of Isabella la Catolica of Spain, late Queen's Foreign Service Messenger, on the 11th inst., at Calais, in his seventy-first year. He was a son of Mr. Johnson, for many years her Majesty's Consul at Antwerp.

Mr. Robert Archibald Douglas-Gresley, of High Park, county Worcester, J.P. and D.L., Lord of the Manor of Salwarpe, on the 13th inst. in his ninety-first year. The second son of the Rev. Robert Douglas, Rector of Salwarpe, he assumed the additional surname of Gresley, in compliance with the will of Mr. Philip Gresley.

Mr. George Everest, C.B., on the 21st inst., at his residence, Bexley House, Southfield, Wandsworth, in his eighty-th year. Mr. Everest, who was the only son of the late Mr. John Bentham Everest, of Bodmin, Cornwall, was for upwards of fifty years in the office of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, where for many years he held the important position of chief of the criminal branch. In recognition of his long and meritorious services he was created a C.B. in 1877.

Mr. Walter Carruthers, one of the managing proprietors and editors of the Inverness Courier, at Gordonville, Inverness, on the 20th inst., in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He was one of the sons of the late Dr. Robert Carruthers, whose literary accomplishments and amiable personal character gained high esteem both in England and in Scotland; while Mr. Walter Carruthers himself was an able journalist, and was the writer of many acceptable essays on Highland scenery and local history, some of which were contributed to this Journal. His death is much regretted by a large circle of friends and neighbours.

A meeting, at which Sir Charles Mills, M.P., presided, was held in the City on Tuesday, at which a resolution was unanimously passed in favour of a closer commercial and political relationship between the Mother-country and the Colonies.

THE COURT.

The Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and Princess Margaret and Prince Arthur of Connaught, left Osborne on Thursday morning, the 19th inst. The Duchess of Albany, with Princess Alice and the infant Duke of Albany, took leave of her Majesty on her return to Claremont, and crossed over in the Elfin, Commander Haynes. The Queen having crossed the Solent in the Royal yacht, travelled by the South-Western Railway to Windsor, arriving there at ten minutes to one o'clock. Afterwards the Queen inspected the 3rd Battalion of the Grenadier Guards previous to their departure for the Soudan, the officers being presented to her Majesty by General Ponsonby. Her Majesty has caused inquiry to be made into the case of the wives and children of the married soldiers of the 3rd Grenadier Guards, and the Duke of Cambridge has taken measures to provide accommodation for those families who may be in want of it. Princess Beatrice and the members of her Majesty's household attended Divine service in the private chapel on Sunday morning. Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), who has been visiting the Queen, left Windsor Castle on Monday. The Queen has forwarded an autograph letter to the Colonial Secretary, expressing her warm and grateful feelings to the Colonies for their proffered aid in the Soudan. It is expected that the Queen and Princess Beatrice will reside at Windsor Castle till about the close of next month, when they proceed to Darmstadt, in order to attend the confirmation of the Hereditary Duke of Hesse. Her Majesty and the Princess go later on to Aix-les-Bains, returning, after a short stay on the Continent, to Windsor Castle.

The Gazette announces that the Prince of Wales will, by command of the Queen, hold Levées at St. James's Palace on behalf of her Majesty on Monday, March 2, and on Saturday, March 14 next, at two o'clock.

The Prince of Wales, attended by Captain Stephenson, R.N., and Mr. Knollys, arrived at Marlborough House on Thursday morning, the 19th inst., from Cannes. The Prince and Princess, accompanied by Princess Louise, went to the House of Lords. The Prince visited the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, the Duke of Cambridge, and Duchess of Cambridge. The Prince and Princess, with Prince George and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, inspected the 2nd Battalion of Coldstream Guards on Saturday morning, previous to their departure for Egypt, and wished them good health, Godspeed, and safe return. In the evening the Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince George, were present at the Handel Society's concert at St. James's Hall. The Prince and Princess, Prince George, and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, were present at Divine service on Sunday. On Monday the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge visited Aldershott to select a site for the statue of the Duke of Wellington. Their Royal Highnesses examined the statue now lying at the Ordnance Store, and having inspected several proposed sites, decided, it was understood, on Round Hill, at the rear of All Saints' Church. Afterwards the Royal visitors lunched at Government House, the residence of Sir A. Alison, General in Command. The Prince and Princess witnessed the performance of "As You Like It" at the St. James's Theatre in the evening. On Tuesday morning the Prince was present at a meeting of the Royal Commission on the Dwelling-places of the Working Classes, at 8, Richmond-terrace. In the evening his Royal Highness was at the House of Lords. The Princess presided at a meeting at Lansdowne House, the residence of Lord Rosebery, in the afternoon, of the members of the Ladies' National Aid Association (Soudan and Egypt). Donations amounting to £600 were announced. Princess Beatrice visited the Prince and Princess in the afternoon. The Duchess of Albany likewise visited their Royal Highnesses, and remained to luncheon. The Prince and Princess and their daughters attended the performance at Covent Garden Theatre in the evening.

Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne paid a visit to the Mansion House last Tuesday, on the occasion of the presentation to the Marquis of the freedom and livery of the Tin-Plate and Wire-Workers' Company.

ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND.

We are authorised to announce that the Prince and Princess of Wales will go to Ireland early in April, and will visit several parts of the country. At the request of his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, the Queen has been graciously pleased to sanction the holding of a Levée by the Prince of Wales, and a Drawingroom by the Princess of Wales, on her Majesty's behalf, in Dublin Castle.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGE.

The marriage of Mr. George Buchanan, youngest son of the late Sir Andrew Buchanan, with Lady Georgina Bathurst, was solemnised on Wednesday afternoon, by special license, at St. Peter's, Eaton-square. The bride, who was given away by her father, Earl Bathurst, wore a dress of white satin duchesse, trimmed with Brussels lace and pearls, with long train, a wreath of orange-blossoms, and veil of Brussels lace. She was attended by five bridesmaids, three being children—namely, Lady Evelyn Bathurst, Miss Geraldine Ponsonby, Miss D. Hankey, Miss T. Lister, and Miss Stepney—who wore frocks with short draperies and full bodies of cream crêpe cloth trimmed with Valenciennes lace, and waistbands with hanging bows of geranium velvet and coloured velvet toques. Their bouquets were snowdrops. The best man was Mr. Ralph Paget.

Sir William Muir was inducted to the Principalship of Edinburgh University last Saturday.

Mr. William Hepworth Mercer took the One Hundred Guinea Scholarship in Real Property Law in the Inner Temple.

Messrs. Henry S. King and Co. have received the appointment of sole official agents for India in connection with the Colonial and Indian exhibition to be held in London in 1886.

The President and Council of the Society of Architects will give a conversazione in the Floral Hall, Covent-garden, next Monday evening.

Mr. Sheriff Faudel Phillips presided last Saturday at the annual meeting of the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution, when Sir R. A. Cross, M.P., distributed the prizes and certificates to the successful students. Lord Norton and several members of Parliament subsequently spoke.

"Kelly's Handbook to the Titled, Landed, and Official Classes," has attained its eleventh year of publication. The object of this work, which is to include in one general alphabetical list all those who have any definite position, is thoroughly carried out. It is a most useful work.

The Board of Trade have awarded a piece of plate to Captain C. Hollaar, of the Dutch fishing-smack Zee-en-Sandbourd, in acknowledgment of his humanity and kindness to the shipwrecked crews of the two British fishing-vessels, the Clara and Elizabeth, of Hull, and the Tarlair, of Peterhead, which were abandoned at sea in the year 1884.

MUSIC.

The specialties of last week occurred too late for notice until now. On the Thursday evening, at St. James's Hall, the Bach Choir gave its first concert of its new season, conducted by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt. In accordance with the recent extension of plan beyond its original limitation, the programmes have been allowed to include music by other composers than the great master by whose name the institution is distinguished. At last week's concert there was but one piece by Bach, the Pastoral symphony from his "Christmas Oratorio," which was given with the "Oboi d'amore" parts as originally written, instruments of this obsolete kind having been manufactured for the occasion. The concert opened with Mr. C. H. H. Parry's setting of scenes from Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound," an ambitious work, in the ultra-modern school, that was noticed by us on its production at the Gloucester Festival of 1880. The programme closed with "The Star of Bethlehem," a short oratorio, by Friedrich Kiel, of Berlin, a composer of sterling merit. The work contains some good choral writing, in which the composer gives proof of his high proficiency in the use of the scientific resources of his art. The solo music—which is not particularly interesting—was well sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss H. Wilson, and Mr. E. Lloyd; these artists and Mr. W. H. Brereton having also been the soloists in Mr. Parry's music. The performances generally were of high efficiency. The Bach choir will give a special concert at the Royal Albert Hall, on March 21, in celebration of the bi-centenary of Bach's birth, when his Mass in B minor ("Die Höhe Messe") will be grandly rendered, conducted by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and with the co-operation of the members of Mr. H. Leslie's choir.

The Handel Society gave its inaugural public concert at St. James's Hall last Saturday evening, when "Saul" was performed, this being one of the several commemorations of the bicentenary of the composer's birth. The most important of all will be the great Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace in June, given in anticipation, by one year, of its regular triennial recurrence. Saturday's performance of "Saul" was one of considerable merit, although the executants were nearly all amateurs. The principal solo vocalists were Misses E. Green and Ellicott, Mrs. Tuer, Mr. L. Benson, Mr. Pownall, and the Hon. S. G. Lyttelton. Some members of the orchestra, including Mr. A. Burnett as leader, were professional, as were the conductor, Mr. F. A. W. Docker, and the organist, Mr. E. G. Croager. "Saul" had been but little heard for many years before, and the society may do good service by reviving other neglected works of Handel.

The bicentenary of Handel's birth has just been celebrated at Halle, his native town, where a statue was erected to his memory in 1859, the centenary of his death. Towards the cost of this statue—about £1200—nearly one third was contributed by England, where Handel passed the greater part of his life, and produced his grandest works, his immortal series of English oratorios.

The second of this year's Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace took place last week, when the late Joachim Raff's Symphony, "Im Winter," was produced for the first time there. The work is the last of a set of four composed in illustration of the seasons, that now referred to being one of many symphonies left by the prolific composer, whose productiveness may be inferred from its opus number being 214. The four divisions of the work now referred to contain some very effective and characteristic writing, with masterly command of orchestral varieties. The first and two last movements have characteristic headings, "The First Snow," "At the Fireside," and "Carnival," the second movement being without any assigned purpose. Although generally diffuse, and in some places laboured, there is much that is interesting, with some masterly varieties and contrasts. The concert included Mr. Max Pauer's skilful execution of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, and unaccompanied solos, and the refined singing of Mdlle. M. de Lido in an aria by Verdi and a cavatina by Gounod.

The last of Mr. John Boosey's afternoon "London Ballad Concerts," of the present series, took place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday—the last evening concert of the season being announced for next Wednesday.

Signor Mario-Costa's concert at Prince's Hall, on Tuesday evening, drew a fashionable attendance. Several of his own compositions were favourably received, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mr. Isidore de Lara, and other vocalists having contributed to the performances, which also included pianoforte solos by Signor Albanesi.

The programme of Mr. Max Pauer's pianoforte recital at Prince's Hall, on Wednesday, comprised examples of various schools, old and new, classical and brilliant.

Of the opening concert of the seventy-third season of the Philharmonic Society, at St. James's Hall, on Thursday evening, we must speak next week; as also of a matinée of Schubert's music at Prince's Hall on Friday afternoon, and of the Sacred Harmonic Society's concert in the evening, when Handel's "Belshazzar" was announced for performance in celebration of the bicentenary of the composer's birth.

The celebrated Heckmann quartet party has announced three concerts, the first of which was to take place last Thursday, the remaining dates being March 3 and 10. The performances of the party have elicited strong commendations from the Continental press. Of their merits we must speak next week.

Mdlle. Louise Douste (De Fortis)—a skilful young pianist—announced a recital at Prince's Hall on Thursday afternoon, with a good programme including the co-operation of MM. Kornfield and Whitehouse (violin and violoncello), and Miss Griswold as vocalist.

The Promenade Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre are still proceeding. The conductorship has been transferred to M. Rivière, formerly well known in the same capacity at the Covent Garden promenade concerts. He entered on his new engagement last Saturday, when he was warmly welcomed.

Mr. Carl Armbruster is to deliver a series of lectures (with musical illustrations) on "The Life, Theory, and Works of Richard Wagner," at the Royal Institution, beginning this (Saturday) afternoon.

The fourth of Mr. W. Carter's National Festival Concerts at the Royal Albert Hall is announced for this evening, when the programme will consist largely of Welsh music.

The new comic opera (on a Japanese subject) by Mr. W. S. Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan is expected to be produced, at the Savoy Theatre, on March 14.

The anniversary festival of that excellent institution the Royal Society of Musicians is to take place at St. James's Hall on May 7, when the chair will be taken by Mr. Santley.

Music will form an important feature in the arrangements for the forthcoming International Inventions Exhibition at South Kensington. A special committee, of eminent authorities, has been appointed for the organisation of an illustrative exemplification of inventions, designs, and discoveries in reference to music, from ancient times to the present day. Instruments of various kinds and periods, old musical manuscripts and printed music paintings, engravings, and drawings, and other matters in relation to the art, will be displayed. There will also be competitive performances of various kinds. The King of Siam—an exhibitor—will send a native band, and the celebrated Strauss orchestra of Vienna will be engaged.

"The Alexandrine Gavotte," by Marie Antoinette Kingston (Chappell and Co.), is a very bright pianoforte piece, in which the quaint old dance form is happily reflected, with a rich variety of modern harmonic treatment that contrasts charmingly with the antique style of the main subject. As the work of a very young lady (the daughter of a distinguished journalist and critic), the piece holds out good promise for future productions.

"Tziganka," is the title of a waltz, on Russian gipsy melodies, by H. Sutherland Edwards, whose combination of literary and musical skill is well known. The waltz possesses a distinctive character not often met with in pieces of this hackneyed form. The themes are in themselves charming, and are happily adapted to the waltz rhythm. Messrs. Boosey and Co. are the publishers.

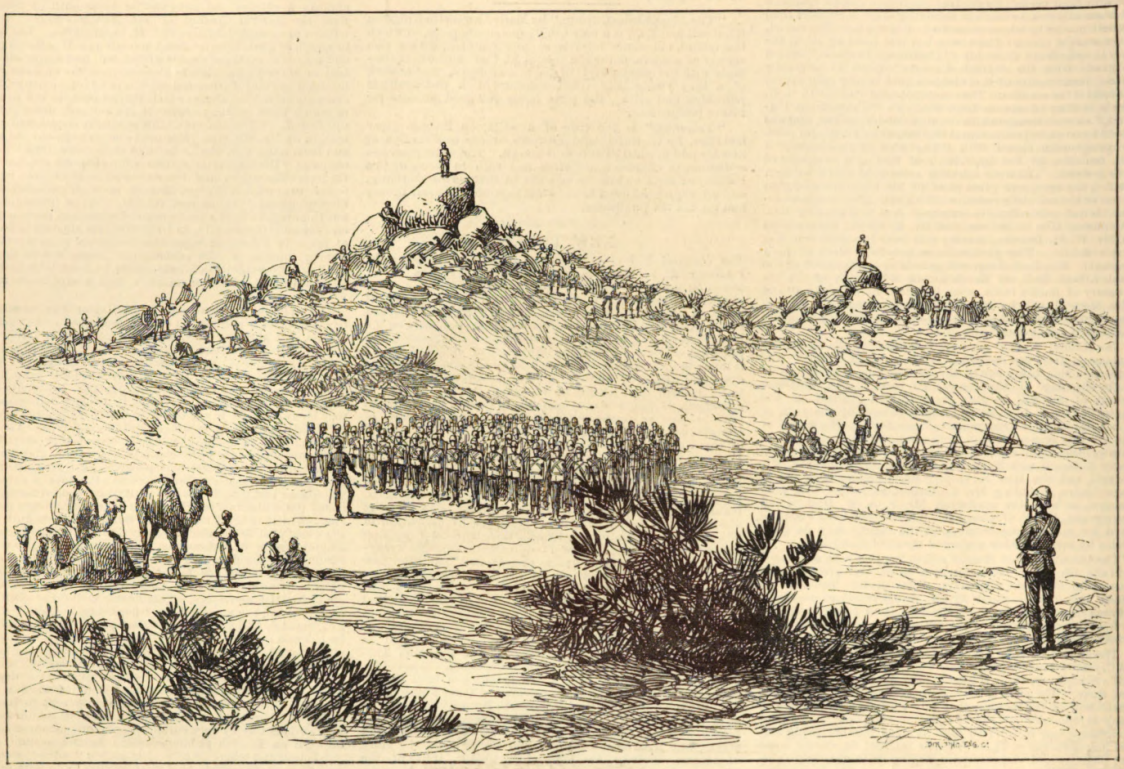
NEW BOOKS.

The compact history of the Flemish School of Painting, by Professor A. J. Wauters, and translated by Mrs. Henry Rossel (London: Cassell and Co., Limited, 1885), is another of those excellent art manuals which we owe to the intelligent direction of the Ecole des Beaux Arts of Paris. For the last two or three years, volumes by distinguished specialists on the history, technique, and processes of art have been issued, at a price which places them within the reach of all students. It is much to be regretted that our Science and Art Department does not display a similar interest in educating popular taste, instead of limiting its efforts to merely collecting specimens, of which it is at no pains to explain the relations towards past or contemporary art. The present series of translations, it is true, is stated to be edited by the Principal of the National Art-Training School at South Kensington Museum, but there is nothing to lead one to suppose that Mr. Sparkes is acting in any official capacity. Be that as it may, Professor Wauters' survey of the Flemish artists is a very valuable contribution to our knowledge of what has been, perhaps, the most restless school of painting in Europe. It was in Flanders that the revolt against conventionalism in missal painting first declared itself, that landscape painting first took root, that the use of oil colours was first recognised, and where both genre and animal painting first found favour amongst artists of the foremost rank. This long rôle of fame included in its first or Gothic period the Van Eycks, Van der Weyden, Memling, and the school of Bruges, whose works cover the greater part of the fifteenth century. With the sixteenth century began the migration of Flemish artists towards Italy, whence they were soon to return, attracted by the development of the wealth of Antwerp and the encouragement there given to art. Meanwhile, however, the National School was to enjoy a brief though brilliant career. Amongst its leaders were Peter Pourbus and his son; the Claessens, who belonged to Bruges; the imitators of Matsys, such as Van Hemessen, Van Romerswael; the Cleve family, who were claimed by Antwerp; Vermeyen, Gassel, and others, who lived near Brussels; and Henry Blès, the glory of Liége. Perhaps the most characteristic trait of the Flemish school is its family tradition of art. It would seem, as Professor Wauters remarks, "that art, on entering a family, turned the heads of all its members—brothers, sons, wives, and daughters, all seemed equally ardent in the pursuit; and thus it not unfrequently happens that, as in the case of the Floris (Van Vriendt), the Van Orleys, the Van Cleves, the Coxies, and the Francks, we meet with half a dozen painters of the name, the number increasing in each succeeding generation. Of the Italianised Flemish or Romanists who shone in the sixteenth century were Lucas de Heere, Adrian Key, and the elder Breughel. Eight years after Breughel's death, Rubens was born; and with him and Vandyck, at once his pupil and his instructor, we touch the highest point which Flemish art attained. But it was Rubens who was to influence for all time the direction of Flemish art. Jordaens and Crayer, no less than Snyders, the animal-painters; Teniers, and the genre painters, alike owe their love of colour, of movement, and arrangement to the great Antwerp artist. In some measure, too, Rubens may fairly claim to have perfected Flemish landscape art, of which Sieberechts, Huysmans, and Neefs are the principal exponents; and the founder's influence was strong enough to keep it alive and flourishing until the eighteenth century sounded the curfew of Continental painting and the angelus of English art. Of late days, Flemish art, as it is now called, Belgian art has revived in no small degree under the influence of Leys, Wappers, Gallait, Portaels, Clays, and E. Wauters, the brother of the learned professor and archivist whose history we have taken as the text for these remarks, and which we cordially recommend as a handy travelling companion to all who set out in the pursuit of art-treasures in Belgium and elsewhere. The translation by Mrs. Rossel is very fairly accurate, and the numerous illustrations give additional interest and point to the text.

A volume, at once eminently learned and readable, has been just published entitled Coins and Medals, their Place in History and Art, by the authors of the British Museum Official Catalogues, edited by Stanley Lane-Poole, with numerous illustrations (Elliot Stock). The subject is treated in a popular style, so as to win attention from the reader who comes to it without previous knowledge. "In the following chapters," writes the editor, "we have attempted to show what coins can teach us, what is their value as documents of history and monuments of art, and what relations they bear to other branches of historical, artistic, and archæological research"; and he adds that, while the book is primarily intended for the general reader, it will be found of service to the antiquary and collector of coins. By way of alluring the student, Dr. Reginald Stuart Poole writes a brief introductory chapter on The Study of Coins. Just as we read the wonderful history of the Etruscans from the painted walls and pottery of their tombs, so do we acquire much of our knowledge of history from numismatics. But what a vast study it is! Dr. Poole observes that some may know Greek and Latin and modern European languages enough to begin the study of Greek and Roman money, but he adds—"Those who would enter the vast field of Oriental numismatics must be fortified with Arabic, Hebrew, Sanscrit, and Persian, besides adding Spanish and Russian to the other European languages still necessary for their work. Even they must pause beneath the Himalayas, nor dare to cross the Golden Chersonese unless they are prepared to master the uncouth languages and intricate characters of the further East." Pausing before this statement, even the ambitious student will probably decide that it is better to trust to the labours of others than to venture on this boundless field of research. He will be grateful, however, in common with all intelligent readers, for the amount of practical knowledge produced in this handbook. The writers, it is needless to say, are all competent authorities on the special branches of numismatics, which they undertake to treat. We may add that book-lovers cannot fail to be pleased with the style in which the work is got up.

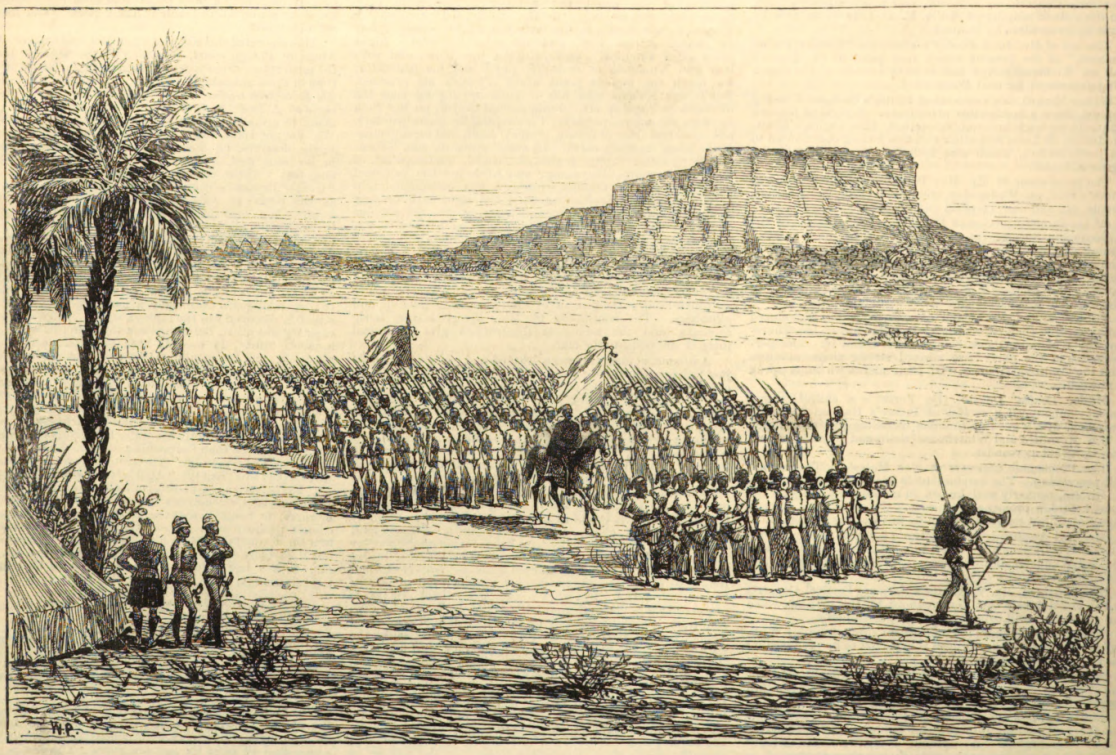
In the same form, and from the same publishing house, appears a curious and entertaining book entitled Glossings from the Natural History of the Ancients (Elliot Stock), written or compiled by the Rev. M. G. Watkins. The reader in search of quaint stories about animals as real as the elephant and cat, or as mythical as the griffin, will find ample satisfaction in these pages. He is also referred to other sources of information, and if possessed with a taste for monsters, is recommended to read Topsel's "History of Four-footed Beasts," in which these strange creatures are not only described, but illustrated. "The Ancients" in this history are allowed a wide margin by Mr. Watkins. He quotes much from our old poets, and from some who, like Tickell and Somerville, rank with the moderns. His illustrations from English poets are, however, far from exhaustive; and in the chapter on the Horse, he even omits to mention the vivid and accurate description of Shakspeare in "Venus and Adonis." Very inadequate, to our thinking, is what may be called the modern portion of the chapter on "Gardens"; and Mr. Watkins appears to be most at home in collecting suggestive anecdotes from Greek and Roman sources—a task demanding much out-of-the-way reading. Conscientious labour seems to have been bestowed on the volume, and the result is highly creditable to the writer.

About life at the two chief English Universities the novelists have given us, if not enough or even too much, at any rate not a little, and a reader may, therefore, be cheered rather than dismayed to know that Haco the Dreamer: by William Sime (Remington and Co.), is described as "a tale of Scotch University life." For, though novelists have been by no means reticent about life at the Scottish Universities, the subject has not been so overdone, if memory and sensations may be trusted, as in the other cases mentioned, and is comparatively quite fresh, as well as absolutely diverse. The story is more like a burlesque than like a serious representation of life; and some of the burlesque is of a grim and ghastly kind. On the other hand, the serious portions have many points of beauty and excellence; and, above all, the tone is extremely wholesome and genial. It is a pretty tale, too, so far as there is any particular tale to tell: it just tells how a young medical student went to the University of Edinburgh, was gulled into the belief that he had accidentally killed a man by careless administration of chloroform, got into debt, neglected his studies, and, within a year or so of matriculation, married the pretty daughter of his father's "grieve" clandestinely, by those easy means which are familiar to all readers of stories about Scottish marriages. This young medical student is, of course, Haco, the novel's hero, who, being the son of a practical Scottish baronet, raised to that dignity for the eminence he has won and the wealth he has acquired in his profession of a surgeon, does not inherit the paternal qualities, talents, and tendencies, but the dreamy, poetical nature, together with the lovely hair, of the surgeon-baronet's departed wife. Haco, nevertheless, assumes an air of wishing to be even as his father was, and is consequently sent to the University of Edinburgh, where things seem to be conducted in a very curious way by very curious people, suggesting something between an English public school, a lunatic asylum, and a pot-house, and where he comes, as such a "softie" would be sure to come, to considerable grief, though to no sort of irremediable harm. In the description of his life at Edinburgh there are some very graphic, some very funny, some very grotesque, and some very instructive passages; and the "contortionist," who can dislocate himself at will, jerk his head about after the manner of a snake, and feign death to the deception of anybody but a great expert, is very droll, though perhaps more than a little vulgar and revolting. Altogether, the story is well worth reading; the "grieve" and his family are admirable.



The celebrated chemist, philanthropist, and Quaker, William Allen, of Plough-court, who died at the close of 1843, has the misfortune, three years afterwards, to be buried a second time in three unreadable volumes. Under the doubtful title, The Spitalfields Genius: the Story of William Allen, F.R.S., &c., retold by J. Fayle, B.A. (Hodder and Stoughton), the effort is made to awaken a fresh interest in this truly good man. We do not think the attempt is wholly successful. Mr. Fayle deserves, no doubt, the credit of telling the story in his own way, but his method is irritating, disjointed, and just a little sensational. The biographer asks the "Gentle Reader"—a creature we imagined to be as extinct as the dodo—to walk into his "enchanted garden," a term, when associated with Allen, as inappropriate as "The Spitalfields Genius." There is no enchantment in his life, although there is much to interest; and there is no genius, but rather great powers, vigorously exercised, of acquisition and observation. Doubtless, as Carlyle said, "genius means transcendant capacity for taking trouble first of all"; but it means a great deal more, and no amount of trouble-taking will ever make a man a poet, a painter, or a scientific discoverer of the highest order. Allen's intellectual capacity was great, but the power he exercised was chiefly of a moral kind. It was his high principle, combined with good sense and the manliness that has its source in virtue, that made monarchs and statesmen proud to call themselves his friends. Mr. Fayle would have done well to attend more to chronology in his narrative, instead of carrying the reader backwards and forwards, to his annoyance and mystification. The account of the three marriages is curiously involved, nor is it exactly accurate, but errors of detail are of less consequence than the peculiar construction of the volume, which leads to repetition. The truth is, and indeed the reader will suspect this from the "Apologia" that serves as a preface, Mr. Fayle has aimed at originality in his "story," and not, as we have said, altogether successfully. It would be a mistake, however, to imagine that the little volume is a failure. We cannot praise it as a bit of literary art, but as the record of a life devoted to noble and wholly unselfish ends, it contains much of more than passing interest. Of Allen it may be said with a truthfulness seldom perhaps to be found upon tombstones that—

> The actions of the just
> Smell sweet, and blossom in their dust.



With the Lord Mayor at its head, an influential committee has been formed with the view of raising a fund to provide a national memorial of General Gordon.—Liverpool has resolved to establish a memorial of the late General Earle, who was a native of the city.

In London 2526 births and 1497 deaths were registered last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 302 and the deaths 429 below the average numbers in the corresponding weeks of the last ten years. The deaths included 52 from smallpox, 31 from measles, 14 from scarlet fever, 14 from diphtheria, 43 from whooping-cough, and 11 from dysentery.

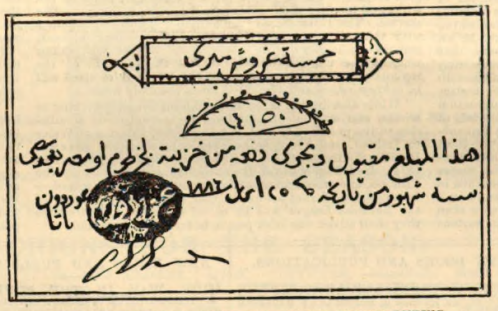
ISMAIL PASHA.

One of the most interesting personages in Europe at this juncture is his Highness Ismail Pasha, of whom we have much pleasure in presenting a fresh Portrait, from a photograph just taken by MM. Elliott and Fry, of Baker-street. It is of particular moment to point out that the late General Gordon considered the restoration of Ismail Pasha would be the most satisfactory solution of the Egyptian Problem, which has been the source of so much anxiety to England in the past, and which again absorbs the attention of Parliament and the nation.

General Gordon, on the eve of his departure for Khartoum in the January of last year, happened to meet a friend of Ismail Pasha at a country house near Southampton. The hero whose tragic death we mourn was engaged at the time to proceed on the mission to the Congo for the King of the Belgians, and was unaware of the dangerous pilgrimage he was destined to set out for at the instigation of a knot of Ministers in Downing-street. It was accordingly quite as a disinterested commentator that General Gordon remarked, in the course of a long conversation—



"Gloomy and fraught with danger as the outlook in the Soudan certainly is, I already see in the course of events some chance of the ultimate fulfilment of my constant prayers for the liberation of the Soudanese out of the hands of their cruel oppressors—the Slave Dealers. . . . Nothing has so much contributed to make the Mahdi's cause popular and his success possible as the weak administration, or pretence of administration, which has gone on at Cairo ever since Ismail was deposed. With the Arabs, nothing is so strong as power. Nubar may succeed, because he is capable of resisting the intrigues of Tewfik, which have hitherto been fatal to every one of his Ministers. It was my knowledge of Tewfik's weakness, and the certainty I felt of his failure, which induced me to throw up my command at Khartoum four years before. When I heard that my friend Ismail was no longer Khedive of Egypt, I first determined to hold the Soudan in his name, against all comers. How could I forsake one who was ever loyal in the support he gave me in my war against slavery and the slave dealers?"

Nor did General Gordon confine his praise of Ismail Pasha to the past. The intrepid English General, who sacrificed his life in defending Khartoum against the hosts of the Mahdi, at that same interview made use of these memorable and weighty words: "If Egypt is to have a Ruler or Regent capable of maintaining a really strong and efficient native Government, Ismail must be the man."

Every mind in England is so preoccupied with the perilous expedition of Lord Wolseley to the Soudan that it may be seasonable to point out that it has been the lot of Ismail Pasha to grapple with a former rebellion on the Soudanese frontier, and to suppress it promptly. Born at Cairo in the Mohammedan year of the Hegira 1248 (the year 1830 of the Christian era), his Highness Ismail Pasha is the second of the three sons of Ibrahim Pasha, the victorious conqueror of Syria. In his youth, Ismail was educated at the military school of the Etat Major, in France, whence he returned to Egypt in 1849. It was while his uncle, the late Said Pasha, was Viceroy that Ismail successfully conducted the expedition of 14,000 men to the Soudan frontier, and speedily overcame the rebellion. Succeeding to the Viceroyalty in the January of 1863, Ismail Pasha made his reign remarkable for the notable increase in the material prosperity of Egypt, observable alike in the traffic through the Suez Canal, towards the completion of which Egyptian revenue was freely lavished, and in the vast development of agriculture and commerce. To England, Ismail Pasha has ever been a stanch friend. For a variety of services willingly rendered, her Majesty bestowed upon Ismail Pasha the Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath; and in the year 1867 his Highness was the honoured guest of the Queen on his visit to this country. That the great improvements effected by Ismail Pasha in Egypt burdened the country with an almost overwhelming debt everybody knows. But it is not so generally known that it was the extortionate rate of interest levied by the loan-mongers which in the end drove the Khedive to abdicate. By a decree of the Porte, his eldest son became his successor on Aug. 8, 1879. The rule of his son, Tewfik Pasha, having been but a melancholy record of failure after failure, it will appear to many that the British Government might do worse than re-establish the Khedive, who, profiting from his past lessons, would reasonably labour hard to bring order out of chaos, and to restore the prosperity of Egypt.

ISMAIL PASHA, THE EX-KHEDIVE OF EGYPT.

THE KING COUNTRY, NEW ZEALAND.

A paper on "The King Country, New Zealand," was read by Mr. Kerry-Nicholls on Monday evening before the members of the Geographical Society. Lord Aberdare presided, and there was an unusually large attendance.

The lecturer described in detail the physical features of the King Country, which is inhabited exclusively by the Maories, and is consequently a little-known region. European settlers being jealously excluded from the country, Mr. Nicholls found some difficulty in prosecuting his enterprise. His energy and determination, however, enabled him to surmount all obstacles. In the course of his journey he found that all the strata or rock formations from which gold, coal, iron, &c., are obtained exist in the country, while its extensive forests are rich in timber of the most varied kind. Among other valuable geographical discoveries made by Mr. Nicholls during his interesting journey was that there were not fewer than twenty-five rivers not published in the maps. Referring to the inhabitants, he expressed a decided opinion that the Maori race is rapidly on the decrease. In Cook's time it exceeded one hundred thousand, and in 1881 it was reduced to forty-four thousand. There is still, however, a large number of natives in the King Country; but, though he conversed with tattooed warriors of the old school, it is clear, he said, that this splendid type of savage will soon become extinct. Mr. Nicholls gave a glowing picture of the scenery and sun effects in the neighbourhood of Lake Taupo, a great sheet of water which receives the contributions of seventeen rivers, and described the volcanic and mountain formations of the country.

The lecture was illustrated with diagrams of the mountain and lake scenery, while a fine picture of a Maori chief was placed upon the platform. Several native weapons were also shown.

THE CHURCH.

The Bishop of Rochester is ordered away at once from home and all duty, until Easter.

A stained-glass window has been put up in Lambeth church to the memory of the late Archbishop Tait.

The Bishop of Newcastle (Dr. Wilberforce) on Tuesday evening subscribed the oath and took his seat in the House of Lords, in succession to the Bishop of Lincoln.

The Rev. Charles Hamilton, M.A., chaplain and secretary to the Bishop of Quebec, has been elected to fill the See of Niagara, rendered vacant by the death of Bishop Fuller.

The Rev. William Cunningham, B.D., of Trinity College, has been appointed Hulsean Lecturer or Christian Preacher at Cambridge for the ensuing year.

The Rev. E. Bertram Lavies, Curate of St. Luke's, Derby, has been presented to the vacant vicarage of Donisthorpe, Leicester.

The jubilee meeting of the Church Pastoral Aid Society was held at the Mansion House on the 19th inst., and was addressed by the Bishop of Sodor and Man and several others. It is proposed to mark the occasion by raising £50,000 to extend the operations of the society.

At a meeting of the council of the Rochester Diocesan Society, held on Monday last, under the presidency of the Archdeacon of Southwark, a grant of £100 was made for the site for the Church of St. Catharine, Loughborough Park, and £125 for the site for a mission building in the parish of All Saints', Rotherhithe, where a mission is being started by members of Clare College, Cambridge.

The preachers at Westminster Abbey during March will be:—Sunday, 1st, at ten, the Rev. E. Price; at three, Rev. Frederick Ponsonby; at seven, Rev. Herbert Rowsell (St. Luke's, Shepherd's-bush). Sunday, 8th, at ten, Professor Momerie; at three, Canon Prothero; at seven, Rev. T. E. C. Welldon (Dulwich). Sunday, 15th, at ten, Canon Prothero; at three, Rev. Field Flower Goe; at seven, Rev. MIDDLESEX COUNTY RECORD SOCIETY.

The Justices of Middlesex have lately been directing a good deal of attention to the old records of the county, preserved at the Sessions House, Clerkenwell. Until about two years ago, these had been packed away in a very inadequate space, and were generally in a condition which made any examination of them impossible; but, the notice of the Justices having been called to the fact, application was made to the Historical MSS. Commissioners, who directed Mr. Cordy Jeaffreson to inspect them as well as the circumstances allowed, and to report upon them. As the result of this report, the documents have now been arranged, labelled, and indexed, and deposited in a newly constructed Muniment-Room, at a cost altogether to the county of more than £1000; and the full extent and value of the collection can for the first time be seen.

The Records commence in the third year of Edward VI. (1549), a date earlier than that of any other county records except those of Essex and the North Riding of Yorkshire, which, however, cannot compare with those of Middlesex in extent or interest. The Session Rolls form a series covering successive years from 1552, complete except as to a few in the earlier years; and of these Mr. Jeaffreson remarks, in an interesting passage, too long for entire quotation here, that they are of unusual value for documents of their class, owing to the practice of the Clerks of the Middlesex Justices to append at the foot of each recognisance a note of the matter to which it referred. And he adds that a careful manipulation of them "would yield a large addition to the materials of England's religious history from the records of the presentments of Catholic Recusants and the prosecutions of Protestant Dissenters in the seventeenth century; while from the indictments for seditious libels might be recovered to English literature the heart and life of many a curious tract that perished in the Stuart period in flames kindled by the common hangman."

The Sessions Books, commencing in 1639, fill more than 1700 volumes, and a series of Land Tax accounts of the various parishes occupy 7000 books of various sizes. A series of orders of Court at Quarter Sessions from 1716 onward; oath rolls; registers of Papists' estates; convictions and appeals for holding conventicles; certificates of nonjurors, recusants, &c.; hearth and stove tax; accounts; orders of council concerning the Great Plague, together with a number of documents of a miscellaneous character, complete a collection of archives amounting to no less than 10,000 volumes, large and small, and nearly 5000 rolls and bundles. To quote Mr. Jeaffreson again, "the whole form a body of muniments which would enable a zealous and competent antiquary to produce an adequate history of the county from Elizabeth to Victoria."

In order to make this valuable collection generally available by producing a descriptive calendar of the whole and publishing a selection from such as appear most worthy of notice, a society has been formed under the name of the Middlesex County Record Society, of which the Lord Lieutenant of Middlesex, Viscount Enfield, is the President, and several of the largest owners of property in the county, including the Dukes of Devonshire and Westminster, are vice-presidents. The treasurer is Sir H. W. Gordon, K.C.B. The society has its head-quarters at the Sessions House, Clerkenwell, and it is to be hoped that it will meet with the support which the interesting nature of its work demands.

Preliminary arrangements were made at a meeting at Bath on Tuesday for the visit of the Social Science Congress in October next.

The sixth annual London show of the Shire Horse Society opened at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, on Tuesday, and continued during the three following days.

The Queen has approved of the appointment of Lieutenant-General Sir A. Alison, K.C.B., as Adjutant-General to the Forces, vice General Lord Wolseley, G.C.B., now General Commanding-in-Chief in Egypt.

A meeting of the Fawcett Memorial Fund Committee, at which the Duke of Westminster presided, was held on the 20th inst., when Mr. Courtney, M.P., stated that the fund amounts to £2500. An executive committee was appointed to consider what steps should be taken to increase the fund, and in what way its purpose—the provision of additional facilities for the higher education of the blind—can be best attained.

The amounts which have been collected to reward the two boatmen, William Barnham and William Hudnott, for rescuing the young woman and two children from the Thames at Grove Park, Chiswick, on Dec. 31, were distributed in the club-room of the Chiswick Sailing Club last week by Mr. Pringle, who had undertaken to receive the contributions. The two men received £7 10s. each, and suitable presents were also made to three members of Mr. Maynard's family, who had given material assistance.

An appendix to the reports of the chief registrar of Friendly Societies for the year 1883 gives the number of trades' unions in England and Wales as 210, with a total amount of funds of £529,587, an annual income of £358,286, and 249,653 members. In Scotland there are fourteen societies, with £16,891 in funds, an annual income of £12,394, and 12,940 members; and in Ireland there are twenty-two societies, with £3088 in funds, £7697 yearly income, and 3160 members.

Major James Gildea, 20, Phillimore-gardens, W., will be glad to receive subscriptions for the temporary relief of the wives and families of our soldiers and sailors ordered on active service. The Government "separation" allowance, together with that stopped from the pay of the soldier himself, amounts to 1s. per day for his wife and 3d. for each child; whereas the married women not on the strength of the regiments are wholly unprovided for. All sums received will be acknowledged and accounted for in the daily press.

While distributing prizes in Dublin on Tuesday evening to science and art students, the Lord Lieutenant made an allusion to the promised visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland, and his remarks were enthusiastically cheered. His Royal Highness visited Ireland in 1856, in 1868, and in 1871. In 1868 his Royal Highness was accompanied by the Princess, and on each occasion he was most cordially received.—It is understood that before the visit takes place a meeting of the National League will be called to consider what course they shall advise the Irish people to take on the occasion.

LAW.

In the Queen's Bench on Monday, before Baron Pollock and a special jury, Mr. Edward Ivimey sued Mr. Sims Reeves for damages for breach of contract by not singing at a concert. Mr. Sims Reeves pleaded that he had been prevented by illness from singing at the time; but, notwithstanding the evidence which he produced to sustain his plea, the jury found for the plaintiff, with £50 damages.

The Queen's Bench division gave judgment on Monday in a case of supreme importance to the personal liberty of Englishmen. Mr. Justice Grove and Mr. Baron Huddleston held that Mr. Hillman, of Lewes, had been committed to a pauper lunatic asylum by two magistrates on an order improperly drawn up, and without due obedience to the forms of the law, and they directed that the order should be quashed.

In the case of a pauper charged at the Lambeth Police Court with neglecting to carry out the task on the hand-mill at the workhouse, Mr. Chance, before whom the hearing came, personally satisfied himself by taking a turn on the mill that the task was not beyond the strength of the prisoner, who thereupon promised that if he were released he would never come upon the parish again. The prisoner was accordingly discharged with a salutary caution.

A new method of robbery was described at the Mansion House Police Court last Saturday. A traveller was driving along Gracechurch-street with two bags of money in the front part of his vehicle. Two men drove close behind in a gig, and a third was running alongside. The latter drew a hooked stick from the gig, lifted the leather covering at the back of the traveller's cart, and drew out the bag of silver. He had been watched by a constable, who apprehended him with the bag in his hand. The two in the gig drove off, but turned into a cul de sac, where they were caught. The prisoners, named Clark, Hall, and Harrison, were committed for trial.

Cunningham and Burton were again brought up at Bow-street on Monday, and additional evidence was given identifying them with the dynamite outrages.

John Lee, the murderer of Miss Keyse at Babbacombe, was led upon the scaffold on Monday morning at Exeter Jail for execution. But the lever under the platform did not work properly; and, after three ineffectual attempts to carry out the sentence of the law, the convict was removed to his cell. Later in the day the Home Secretary respited Lee, and his sentence will be commuted to penal servitude for life.

The annual festival of the City Dispensary was held on Tuesday evening at the Albion Tavern, Mr. Sheriff G. Faudel Phillips presiding, in the absence of the Lord Mayor. Subscriptions were announced to the amount of over £300.

The second musical demonstration by the Early Closing Association will be held at St. James's Hall this (Saturday) evening, consisting of a performance of vocal and instrumental music by employés in various wholesale and retail houses of business. Mr. J. Barnby will conduct.

The twelfth annual football-match between Oxford and Cambridge came off at Kennington Oval on Tuesday afternoon, under circumstances which left little to be desired. The players were very evenly matched, the ground was in fair condition, the weather was magnificent, and, best of all, the game was well contested. Cambridge won.

The Duke of Cambridge presided on Tuesday afternoon at the winter meeting of the National Rifle Association, and in his speech said that the financial condition of the association was satisfactory. He stated that it was probable that no Snider ammunition would be required at Wimbledon this year, and that all the Volunteer shooting would be with the Martini-Henry. Australia and India have expressed their intention of sending teams annually to Wimbledon.

The "Directory of Directors for 1885" has just been issued by Mr. Thomas Skinner, of 1, Royal Exchange-buildings, E.C. The work is already well known as a nearly indispensable handbook to investors and those who would know "who's who" in that ever-increasing world of joint-stock companies. A company is known by its board as much as by its object, and it appears to be Mr. Skinner's purpose, in his various publications, to give to investors the means of judging for themselves as to this and all other material points. This book contains an account of 10,000 directors.

CRÊPE IMPÉRIAL.
FOR MOURNING WEAR.
"MESSRS. JAY, of Regent-street, London, have a novel manufacture for black. It is all wool, and yet looks exactly like crêpe, as it has the crinkled or crimped surface which is inseparable from that fabric. It is solid and most durable, being free from the elasticity of the more perishable silk crêpe, which it so closely resembles, and yet it is glossy. It appears under the name of 'Crêpe Impérial,' and is made up effectively into costumes for deep mourning, when it is not compulsory to trim with crêpe. The firm should be congratulated on introducing a fabric which will answer for the deepest mourning dress, and will wear as long as the mourner elects to use it."—Extract from "The Queen, the Lady's Newspaper."
JAY'S, REGENT-STREET.

EVENING DRESSES.—Two guineas and 2½ guineas each, with sufficient material for bodice included. The Newest and most fashionable style, and made of Non-Crushing Silk Net. Pencil drawings of the same, postage free, on application.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood stated publicly in Court that Dr. J. DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—The Right Hon. Earl Russell communicated to the College of Physicians and J. T. Davenport that he had received information to the effect that the only remedy of any service in cholera was Chlorodyne.—See "Lancet," Dec. 31, 1865.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.—Extract from the "Medical Times," Jan. 12, 1866:—"Is prescribedly scorns of orthodox practitioners. Of course, it would not be thus singularly popular did it not supply a want and fill a place."

THE "LOUIS" VELVETEEN

"Le Follet" says:—The Louis Velveteen has already rejoiced in a longer reign in the world of fashion than that of any material within our recollection; and when we take into consideration that it is equally suitable for all occasions—an advantage no other fabric possesses—and that, whether employed as a complete dress, portions of toilettes, or trimmings, it is as effective as it is serviceable, its favour is not surprising.

The Louis Velveteen, from its wonderful resemblance to the richest Silk Velvet, is essentially a lady's material; the lights and shadows, so thoroughly like those of Genoa and Lyons Velvet, the rich folds and graceful drapery, so soft and silky to the touch, all account easily for its great and permanent vogue among the aristocracy, both here and abroad.

Though very strong, it is so light in wear that even in elaborately made dresses, with long trains, it has no inconvenient weight; while from some peculiar and special arrangement of the pile, no amount of creasing will flatten or rub it; neither rain nor dust alter its rich colourings, or dim the silky bloom for which it is so celebrated — advantages that cannot be too highly appreciated.

EVERY YARD OF THE GENUINE BEARS THE NAME "LOUIS."
THE WEAR OF EVERY YARD GUARANTEED.

From all Drapers throughout the Kingdom.

ADRIAN VIDAL.

BY W. E. NORRIS,

AUTHOR OF "MDLLE. DE MERSAC," "MATRIMONY," "THIRLBY HALL," &c.

MR. AND MRS. ADRIAN VIDAL.

If at any future time it should seem possible to run railway-trains between London and Paris without danger to the integrity of the British Empire, many deserving persons will, no doubt, feel that one more scourge has been taken away from existence; but all improvements are apt to bear hard upon individual cases, and it is certain that the removal of the Channel steamers would deal a heavy blow at the prosperity of Folkestone. Why, in this fastidious age, so much enjoyment should be derived from the contemplation of several hundreds of fellow-creatures in a most unbecoming state of physical degradation, there is no need to inquire—human nature being so full of contradictions; but as to the fact of the enjoyment, there can hardly be two opinions; and this is naturally intensified by a strong wind from the S.S.W., meeting the tide, and an unusually large boat-load of victims.

These conditions being satisfactorily fulfilled one afternoon in the late autumn, the visitors to Folkestone had descended from their heights in formidable numbers, and had ranged themselves on either side of that via dolorosa which is but too familiar to most of us. Between the lines of spectators the draggled and forlorn passengers hastened onwards, some with a ghastly pretence of jauntiness; others darting furious glances to right and left; others, again, too crushed by the memory of their calamities to care who saw them or what they looked like; and as the melancholy procession filed past, those who watched it exchanged comments of a derisive nature, and were as happy as so many inhuman Spaniards at a bull-fight. But in any spectacle there are sure to be some component parts which will disappoint expectation; and upon this occasion, as usual, a few persons insulted the public by walking ashore as if nothing was the matter. Conspicuous among these were a lady and a gentleman of whom no worse thing could be said than that they were obviously bride and bridegroom. This, to be sure, is a humiliating classification to carry about with one, and involves those who cannot conceal their title to it in a certain amount of obloquy; still, if one must be detected as a bridegroom, it is something not to be a sea-sick bridegroom; and doubtless many a bride would be thankful to land upon her native shores with cheeks as rosy as those displayed by Mrs. Adrian Vidal.

The roses deepened slightly in colour as fragments of certain half-audible comments reached their owner's ears, and she quickened her pace, whispering to her husband, "Let us get away from these odious people. Are they London shop-keepers out for a holiday, do you think?"

But Vidal, who did not mind being stared at, surveyed the surveyors with a smile, and answered, "No, my dear: judging from their general aspect, I should say that they belonged, almost without exception, to the upper middle classes; and they don't mean to be rude. If you were the Princess of Wales, whom they adore, they would treat you with even less respect. It is the penalty of greatness to attract attention; and when one happens to possess the most beautiful face in the three kingdoms"——

But at this point Mrs. Vidal caught the speaker's arm and hurried him into the shelter of the Pavilion Hotel, without allowing him to finish his sentence. It was she who, upon the principle of draining the cup of pleasure to its dregs, had decided that they should proceed no farther than Folkestone that night. The morrow would restore them to the cares and pleasures of ordinary life; but this last evening of their honeymoon should be spent, as the others had been spent, amid surroundings which suggested no thought of anything save the present.

Those who are in a position to speak authoritatively are fond of affirming that the honeymoon is seldom the happiest period of a man's or woman's life; but possibly Vidal and Clare may have been exceptional persons, for it is certain that their happiness, since the ceremony which had taken place in Polruth church a month before, had known neither cloud nor check. They had visited, somewhat hastily, the cities and watering-places of south-western France; they had dined at tables-d'hôte, hemmed in by phalanxes of their compatriots, without addressing a word to any of them, and had not wearied of one another's society nor of ringing the changes upon an oft-told tale. Now, as the last hours of the last day of irresponsibility drew nigh, Clare would have it that they should resemble those of the previous days, and, despite the lateness of the season and the blusterous weather, insisted upon her husband's taking her out for a walk after dinner, while he smoked his evening cigar.

"When we are settled in our own home," she said, a little ruefully, "you will have your study, where you will smoke, and where I shall not be admitted. Well, sometimes, perhaps—for ten minutes or so, but not more. You know you can't work when anyone is in the room; you have often told me so. You have no work to do to-night, though, and no study to work in; so I may keep you all to myself with a quiet conscience."

It chanced, however, that Mrs. Vidal was to be denied that privilege, after all. The down express had just come in, and as our young friends crossed the hall of the hotel they encountered a stream of newly-arrived travellers, amongst whom was a shrunken figure in a fur-lined coat, familiar to both of them.

"Mr. Heriot!" exclaimed Clara; "how glad I am to see you!"—while Vidal called out: "Heriot himself, as I'm a living sinner! Why, man, I thought you were to start for the south six weeks ago!"

"I had to put it off: I have been in the doctor's clutches again," answered Heriot, after he had shaken the hands extended to him; "but I shall cross to-morrow, if all's well. I never thought of meeting you here—I didn't know you meant to return so soon."

His manner was somewhat confused, and it was evident that this unexpected meeting gave him more surprise than pleasure. After a few more words had been exchanged, he said: "I mustn't keep you standing here. Perhaps I may have an opportunity of saying good-bye to you in the morning. I'll go and see what sort of a room they have got for me now."

"You will do no such thing," returned Vidal. "You will come into our sitting-room, where you will find a fire, and where they will bring you your dinner. And after that, Clare will allow you to smoke a cigar with me."

"Thanks, very much," replied Heriot; "but I dined before I left London." He added, in a lower tone, "My dear boy, do you think I have no manners? You are very kind; but you can't possibly want me; and one isn't supposed to recognize people when they are on their wedding-trip, is one?"

"I don't know what the supposition may be," said Vidal, "but I know that you are not going to be allowed the chance of cutting our acquaintance. What an unfriendly old beggar you are! Not want you, indeed! Why, Clare and I shall spend our evenings together for the rest of our lives; whereas"——

"Whereas you may never spend another evening with me," interrupted Heriot, with a slight laugh. "Well, there's something in that."

He suffered himself to be led into the sitting-room and installed in an arm-chair beside the fire, though he could not be persuaded to smoke in Mrs. Vidal's presence. The warm atmosphere; the cheerful aspect of the little room, which, although it was as scantily furnished as sitting-rooms in English hotels always are, had at least so much of snugness as a crimson carpet and window-curtains can bestow; the loquacity of the young people, who seemed to be, and indeed were, unaffectedly glad to see him—all these things ended by thawing the unwonted chill which had at first been noticeable in his demeanour. He did not say much, but sat resting his chin upon his folded hands and looking out over them with those soft, bright eyes of his, while Adrian favoured him with a narrative of their travels, which Clare interrupted at every other word. The adventures that had befallen them had not, apparently, been of a very startling kind, nor were the little jokes and pleasantries with which they attacked one another from time to time calculated to amuse everybody; but Heriot, whose enjoyment of life was for the most part vicarious, and who was more attached to this couple than to any other two people in the world, was made happy by their innocent happiness, as they knew that he would be, and asked for nothing better than to listen to their talk. He took advantage of a momentary lull to remark: "And now, I suppose, you are bound for London?"

"Well, yes," answered Vidal, with a slight hesitation. "The Cornish scheme broke down, somehow or other. Mrs. Irvine couldn't find any house that seemed in the least suitable for us; and, after all, London has its advantages, you know. Clare rather thought she would prefer it, too; so I went up to have a look, and I was lucky enough to find a very decent little house in Alexandra-gardens. You don't know where that is, of course, and I can't explain; but you go on to the far end of Cromwell-road and then wander about until somebody tells you. It's a respectable neighbourhood, if not exactly aristocratic; and I really think that in many ways it will be better for us both to be within hail of the world."

He seemed a little anxious to make excuses for himself; but Heriot ignored this tendency. "I never believed much in the Cornish scheme," he observed; "and I had a letter not long ago from Mrs. Irvine in which she told me of the change in your plans. She mentioned that Mrs. Vidal"——

"What have I done that you should address me as Mrs. Vidal?" demanded that lady.

"Well, Clare then—she mentioned that Clare was in favour of it."

"Of course I was in favour of it," said Clare; "one doesn't marry in order to end one's days in the place of one's birth. I held my tongue until Mamma had wearied herself out with seeking for houses, because it would have been useless to speak sooner; but all the time I was concealing a deep design beneath a mask of indifference."

She was not, however, a particularly good hand at concealment, and she did not contrive to mislead Heriot, who quite understood the true state of the case. With her husband, she had been more successful. Vidal had never suspected that she was making any sacrifice in yielding to certain unexpressed and only half-formed wishes of his; he thought it very natural that she should desire to see more of the world, and was glad that she had that desire; although, if she had urged it, he would have consented to take up his residence in Cornwall without pulling wry faces. As a matter of fact, Clare dreaded the proximity of the fashionable world, but was ashamed of her fears. It may have been in some degree because she was ashamed of them that she had expressed herself so strongly as to the attractions of the metropolis; but she had been actuated chiefly by a generous wish to give Adrian what he wanted, without putting him to the inconvenience of asking for it.

Mrs. Irvine had proved unexpectedly tractable; but, indeed, that excellent lady was seldom anything else, if taken in the right way and at the right time. Tired of surveying country houses to which some insuperable objection was always discovered, and beginning to lament over the many other important duties that she had suffered to fall into arrear, she had received Clare's suggestion that further search should be abandoned with faint protests which gradually melted into acquiescence; and when Adrian assured her that he should not think of furnishing his house without making appeal to her valuable advice and experience, she became quite reconciled to the new arrangement.

"We shall set to work to buy tables and chairs as soon as we get to London," Clare went on. "Mamma is coming up to help us, and poor Adrian will have a bad time of it, I am afraid; but we hope to be settled down before Christmas."

"I must look out for rugs and embroidery at Damascus," remarked Heriot. "Did I tell you that I was going to Syria this winter? If I come across anything really good, I will dispatch it to you, and perhaps you will deign to accept it as a reminder of an absent friend."

"Oh, no; you must keep your pretty things for your own house," said Clare; and Vidal chimed in: "I think we have accepted about enough, as it is. Our tables and chairs, not to mention our carpets and curtains and other necessaries, will be your wedding present, you know, Heriot."

He had had some qualms of conscience about that thousand pound cheque, and felt an embarrassment in speaking of it which was more than shared by its donor, who took no notice of the allusion, but said, lastly, in answer to Clare: "My house is as full as it can hold already. I gave up attempting to beautify it years ago. Besides, I have nobody to share the delight of contemplating fresh acquisitions with me; and you cannot imagine, until you have tried it, how uninteresting it is to buy presents for one's self. In the East one simply can't help making purchases; it is one of the occupations of the day; and if you won't oblige me by taking some of my surplus stock off my hands, the only result will be that it will be pounced upon by somebody else, and used for decorating a drawing-room which I shall probably never enter."

Not long after this he wished his entertainers good-night; and as soon as the door had closed behind him, Clare exclaimed, "Poor Mr. Heriot! I am so very sorry for him!"

"Why? Do you think he looks worse?" Adrian asked.

"No; I don't know that he does; but his is such a sad, lonely life. Adrian," she added, drawing a little nearer to her husband, "I think I am sorry for everybody who is not married."

"One may be sorry for poor old Heriot without allowing one's compassion to take quite so wide a sweep as that," remarked Vidal. "If he felt the want of a wife I have no doubt he could find plenty of people ready and willing to marry him; for he is very well off."

"Oh, a wife who would marry him for the sake of his money—very likely he could. Well, it only shows that money has not much to do with happiness, after all. Poor as we are, I don't want to change places with anybody; do you?"

Vidal made the reply that was expected of him. He was absolutely contented, and said so a dozen times a day. The present was perfect happiness; the future seemed full of the brightest promise; if one of the newly-married pair felt some sinking of the heart when London drew its sooty veil over their heads, Adrian was not that one. He was pleased with everything—pleased to be back among the familiar streets; pleased with the lodgings which Mrs. Irvine had engaged as a temporary abode for him; pleased also, it may be (though he did not say so), at her announcement that she herself was domiciled at an hotel in the neighbourhood.

"I might have had rooms in the same house," she whispered, confidentially; "but I wouldn't take them. Arrangements of that kind are always dangerous, and especially so at a time like this. Only the other day I heard of such a sad case—two young people agreeing to an amicable separation because they had fallen out about the drawing-room paper; and it seems that they might have made friends again if it had not been for the mother-in-law, who most injudiciously took her daughter's part."

"I don't think there is much danger of such a catastrophe in our case," said Vidal, laughing; but Mrs. Irvine rejoined gravely that one could never tell, and that it was best to be on the safe side.

"I hope," said she, "that if you notice any inclination on my part to thrust my views about furniture upon you, you will check it at once."

Vidal promised that he would do so, but did not keep his promise. His views with regard to upholstery were of the modern order, and were so absolutely certain to differ from those of his mother-in-law, that he judged it wisest to efface himself from the outset and intrust all details to Clare, whose taste was good, if not educated up to the most recent artistic standard. This self-abnegation did not go wholly unrewarded; for the furnishing of the house in Alexandra-gardens was eventually accomplished at a cost infinitely smaller than its master had ventured to anticipate. Moreover, Mr. Irvine, who had been brought up to London in consideration of his special knowledge, proved worthy of the confidence reposed in him, and picked up some bargains in Wardour-street and elsewhere which were greatly admired in after days by persons qualified to give an opinion about such matters.

In the meantime, Clare was growing accustomed to the smoky atmosphere of a large city, and was spending her time after a fashion which very few women have ever yet failed to find agreeable. The greater part of each day was passed at the upholsterer's; and in the evenings her husband generally took her to the theatre, which was delightful. She would gladly have prolonged this pleasant interim, during which she had few visitors and no household cares, had she not been moved with pity for poor Adrian, whose literary labours had to be carried on in a dark little dining-room on the ground floor, where he was exposed to perpetual interruption, and who bore this discomfort with a cheerfulness which she could not sufficiently admire.

At length, the list of necessary purchases being exhausted and there being nothing further to be done but to await the good pleasure of dilatory tradesmen, Mr. and Mrs. Irvine returned home; and then a duty which had been too long delayed had to be performed. Mrs. Vidal the elder had not received the news of her son's approaching marriage in a congratulatory spirit, nor had she thought fit to be present at his wedding. Her health, she had averred, precluded her from undertaking so long a journey, and, although she had been guilty of no overt incivility to the Irvine family, it was pretty clearly understood by them that she was not eager to make their acquaintance. To Adrian she had written a formal little note, advising him of the despatch of four salt-cellars to his address, as a wedding gift, and regretting that her straitened circumstances made it impossible for her to be as liberal as she would have desired to be upon these occasions. Poverty, she added, was generally considered a disagreeable thing. Apparently, he did not think so. She hoped he would never see reason to change his opinion.

Since the receipt of this sympathetic missive, Adrian had only heard from his mother once, when she had requested him to bring his bride to Brighton on a three-days' visit as soon as he could spare time to do so. She would not think of asking him to remain longer than that in her dull house, she said, being well aware how few attractions she was able to offer.

There was nothing for it but to comply with so modest and reasonable a request; but Vidal put off doing so as long as he could, and took the train for Brighton at last with more trepidation than he would have cared to own to. He knew that Mrs. Vidal would be prejudiced against her daughter-in-law; he knew that when she was prejudiced against a person she was often spiteful to that person, and sometimes extremely rude; and he shrewdly suspected that Clare would not stand much rudeness. He himself, having a horror of disputes and recriminations, had always managed to get on tolerably well with his mother by the simple expedient of allowing her to say whatever she pleased; but his sister, whose temper was quicker, had not been equally fortunate, and it had happened to him more than once to be an agonised spectator of scenes which he had no desire to see repeated in his wife's case. Therefore, between London and Brighton, he endeavoured by various hints to prepare Clare for possible contingencies.

"My mother is rather odd in some ways; it isn't everybody who takes to her—but after all, she is my mother, you know. Sometimes she says things that people don't like; but if you don't notice them she generally stops; and anything is better than having a row, don't you think so? For three days one can put up with a good deal. And she doesn't really mean to be disagreeable."

From these and other similar phrases, Clare gathered that Mrs. Vidal did mean to be disagreeable and would be disagreeable; but the prospect did not dismay her. For Adrian's sake she would have submitted to many worse things than the scolding of a shrewish old woman, such as she imagined Mrs. Vidal to be, and she determined to accept any and every insult that might be offered to her without retaliating.

When she saw the tall dark woman who had preserved a certain youthfulness of figure, and whose voice had something of the ring of Adrian's, though her features and colouring were so unlike his, she was agreeably disappointed. Mrs. Vidal, if not very affectionate, was far from being insulting. Adrian had told the truth, while supposing that he was doing quite the contrary, when he had said that she did not mean to be disagreeable. After her peculiar fashion, she was fond of her son, and looked forward to his visits more than she would would have acknowledged, or than anyone who knew her would have imagined. She did her best to make this visit pleasant to her guests, whom she treated more like strangers than near relatives; she put her brougham at their disposal, excusing herself from leaving the house on the plea of ill-health, though there was nothing in the world the matter with her; and during their stay she gave two dinner parties, to which she invited the élite of her acquaintance. At these festivities Clare attracted much notice and admiration, and was so fortunate as to earn the good opinion of her mother-in-law.

"I think your marriage was an imprudent one," the latter took occasion to remark to Adrian; "but, setting prudence aside, you are to be congratulated. Your wife is decidedly distinguished."

"Thanks, mother; I was sure you would think so," said Adrian, who had not been at all sure of any such thing and was greatly pleased by this unexpected compliment. "And she is as beautiful as she is distinguished; you will allow that?"

"She is pretty, certainly; but her good looks chiefly concern you. It is more important that she should be a lady. And she is a lady."

"Well, yes; I think she may claim to be a lady," answered Adrian, laughing a little. "If she had not been a lady, I should hardly have married her."

"No?" said Mrs. Vidal, with a slight elevation of her eyebrows. "I did not know that you considered that essential."

It was not in the poor woman's nature to be gracious. The world had gone ill with her—or she fancied that it had gone ill—and possibly she may not have desired that the world should go too well with her neighbours. She was not conscious of wishing them any harm; she was not conscious of caring much about them, one way or the other; but a sort of misguided instinct, which she was unable to resist, led her to hit upon the speeches that were most likely to cause them annoyance. Thus, she profited by an opportunity which offered, the same day, to say to Clare: "I hope you are a good manager. Adrian will not be of much assistance to you in money matters, I am afraid."

"I dare say we shall contrive to get on," Clare replied.

"That is exactly what he would say. He always thinks that he will get on somehow; but unfortunately the fact remains that there are only twenty shillings in a pound. You must have noticed how sanguine and impulsive Adrian is. He gives himself what he wants at the moment, and doesn't trouble about consequences. Look at your engagement and marriage, for example—an affair of six months! As I was telling him this morning, he has been fortunate, in my opinion; but it does seem to have been rather sudden."

"I suppose it does," said Clare, determined not to be annoyed.

"Yes; and of course it is no disparagement to you to say that he ran a considerable risk by being in such a hurry. But that is just his way. Ever since he left school he has been in love with somebody or other."

"He has never married before, though," remarked Clare, smiling, and endeavouring not to show how distasteful this assertion as to her husband's past life was to her.

"No; very true—and perhaps marriage may steady him. I am sure I hope it will."

"I don't think he has ever been unsteady," Clare said.

"Oh, not in the way of being what people call 'wild.' Still, one can't help remembering that you are not his first flame; and that makes one fancy that, perhaps——However, I have no doubt he will make a very good husband, as husbands go, if he is properly managed. I would not be too strict with him, if I were you. What men of his stamp like is to have all pecuniary bothers taken off their hands, to be allowed plenty of liberty, and to have a good dinner provided for them every day. I don't say that this is justifiable, or quite fair upon their wives; but we must take the world as we find it, and it is the more to be wished that one of you should be able to face facts, because it is certain that the other never will."

Such a system of philosophy was hardly likely to find favour in the eyes of any bride. Clare told herself that her mother-in-law's words were prompted solely by ill-nature, and merited nothing but contempt; yet she often recalled them afterwards—as indeed we all recall the speeches that hurt us most—and even at the time she was uncomfortably conscious that their cynicism had an admixture of truth in it. It is unquestionably true that most men like their dinner to be well cooked, and it is perhaps pardonable in some men—in geniuses especially—to shirk the worries attendant upon domestic expenditure. That much Clare was willing to concede; but what was meant by plenty of liberty? She knew very well that there was a certain kind of liberty which she could never be capable of allowing to her husband. She did not, however, give utterance to her thoughts, but merely said, with a slight intonation of displeasure, "I am sorry you think so badly of Adrian."

Mrs. Vidal stared. "I don't think badly of him," she answered; "he is not bad—only a little flighty. I see him as he is, that is all. Perhaps I can judge of my children more dispassionately than most mothers, because I have no personal influence over them. Their father chose to make them independent of me in his will, and they have always been allowed to follow their own devices—or, rather, have insisted upon following them. My daughter Georgina, as I dare say you know, is by way of being a strong-minded woman, and travels about the world all by herself."

"She is in the South Sea Islands now, is she not?" asked Clare, glad to change the subject.

"She was when I last heard from her. I believe she means to write a book on her return, if she ever returns; but it would not surprise me in the least to hear that she had married a native chief. She has had several chances, which she has thought proper to despise, of marrying well in this country; but, judging by her appearance when she came back from her last journey into the interior of Zanzibar, nobody is likely to ask her again. A more deplorable object I never beheld. Mere skin and bone!—and such a complexion that I really thought at first she must have been staining her face with walnut-juice in order to pass herself off as a Hottentot. Speaking from a rational point of view, Georgina ought to have married and Adrian ought to have remained single; but just the reverse has happened, you see."

Upon the whole, Clare was not sorry to turn her back upon Brighton, and could not quite agree with Adrian when he declared that their visit had been a triumphant success. "Then we must beware of repeating it, lest we should go away less triumphant next time," she said.

At this he laughed, and answered that it would probably be some months before they received another invitation. "My mother has done her duty, and so have we. As for pleasure, we don't arrange meetings with that object in our family."

The gross value of the personal estate exceeds £200,000, but the testator states in his will that since his father's death he has acted as banker for his brothers and sisters, and any money so held will have to be deducted therefrom. The testator leaves his house at Knaresbrough, with the cottages adjoining, and £1000 per annum, to his cousin, the said Dr. Francis Collins, for life, then to his sister Mrs. Jane Collins, for life, and then to his nephew, William Collins, with a gift over in the event of the latter not leaving any male issue. VIOLETS.

The sight and scent of violets in our city streets are the first harbinger of spring; and no "wilding of nature" is dearer or more universally beloved. Wild flowers, in popular phraseology, go very much in couples, daisies and buttercups, dog-roses and honeysuckle, primroses and violets, seeming to be the natural correlatives of one another. Town-bred people, too, are in the habit of thinking that, outside the labyrinths of bricks and mortar in which they live, these familiar flowers grow promiscuously—here a daisy, next to it a primrose, with clustering briars and bines in the ragged hedge above, and violets blooming beneath in the shadow.

These, however, are fallacies, and wild flowers have their own distinct order of retreat from the busy haunts of men. Daisies, like sparrows, have no timidity about them, and cheerfully abide and bloom as long as they find space at our thresholds. Buttercups first show stunted blossoms, and then beat a prudent retreat to a little distance beyond the reach of smoke and gas fumes. Primroses are very coy, and even in the suburbs of a rustic watering-place, where one would imagine that the erection of a few villas would make no difference to them, they completely disappear in the course of three or four years. Dog-violets linger long and crop up in the borders of suburban gardens twelve and fourteen years after they have been laid out and filled with successive crops of bedding plants. Sweet purple violets vanish very rapidly, or, at all events, they drag on a miserable existence with a few stunted leaves and abortive flower-buds; while they utterly disappear from the banks and hedges in a radius of several miles round a city or large town.

It is a very curious fact that white violets, though they grow plentifully in our home counties, are scarcely ever seen in the market. The bunches sold in our shops and streets are exclusively purple; though here and there a small bunch of snowdrops, with one or two purple violets intermingled, are tied up with a mallow-leaf, and offered as "white 'uns." No one seems to cultivate white violets, unless it be here and there a few double ones; and there is a rare kind of double white violet that is almost like a tiny pink-tinged rose.

White violets grow wild luxuriantly in many parts of the fen counties, and in Essex, Middlesex, Bucks, Beds, and Oxfordshire; purple ones being equally plentiful, however, in the three latter. Both varieties prefer the side of the hedge which catches the afternoon sun. Now and then they spread themselves over a bit of pasture, as well as on its banks. There is, or was, at Aston Clinton, an old orchard where they grow in this manner among the grass and daisies, accommodating themselves to their position by producing quantities of blossom, with stalks so short that it is almost impossible to gather them. In Hereford, Shropshire, and Gloucestershire, violets are supposed to be in full bloom by Mothering Sunday; but, as that is a movable feast, it merely signifies that March in most seasons is the month when violets blossom, though when the snow has been long on the ground and the north-east winds are bitter, they postpone their coming till April, and then burst upon us in a wealth of beauty which is Sweet and fleet as the time of the roses.

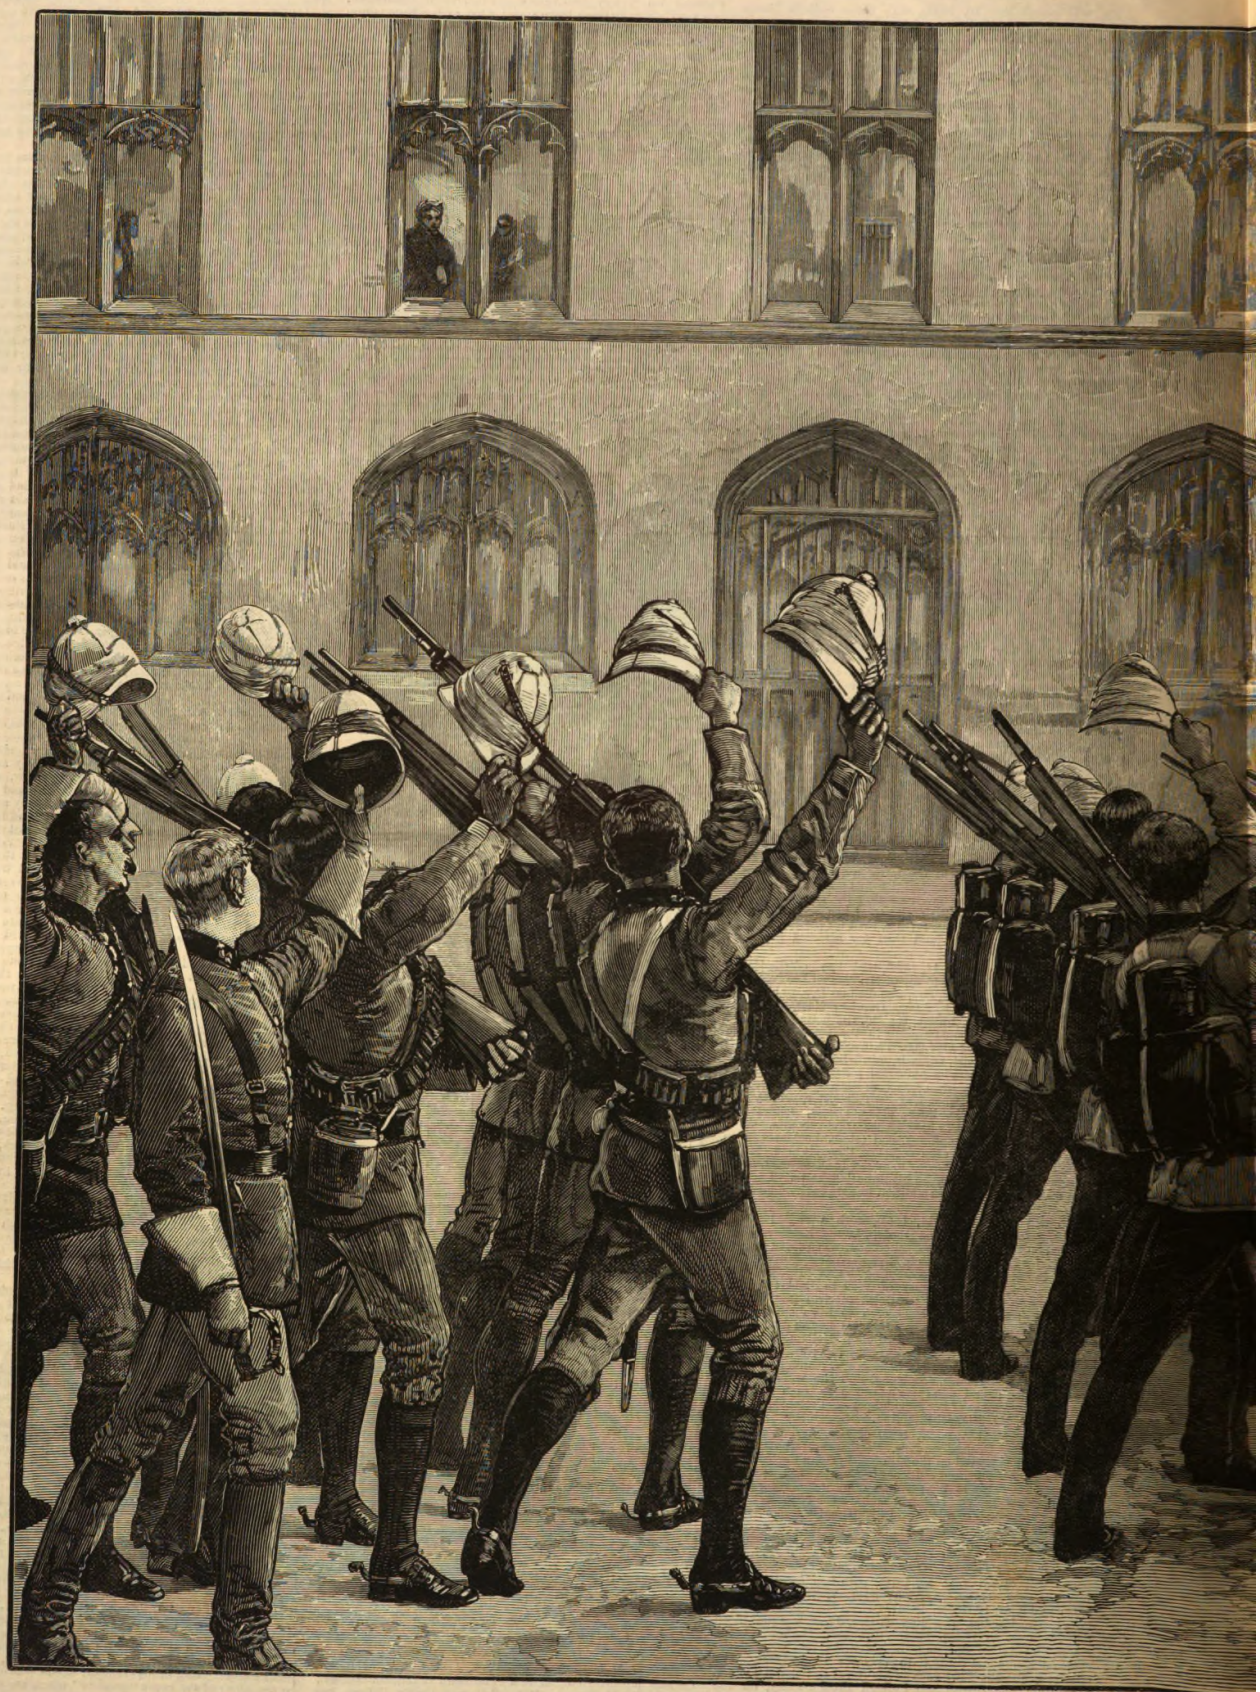
In some parts of southern England, where we should most naturally look for quantities of wild violets, they are remarkably scarce. In Devonshire there are very few, save where the hand of man has sown or planted them, and then they flourish exceedingly. In the Isle of Wight they are not over plentiful, except about Newchurch. In the landslip between Luccombe and Bonchurch there used to be a great many white violets; but since the railway from Ryde to Ventnor has brought so many tourists, and the pathway through this lovely bit of scenery has become almost as well worn and as thickly spread with paper and orange peel as Hampstead Heath or any other resort of suburban holiday makers, the violets have gradually retired, and, save for a few stray roots here and there under the boulders, have encamped in a field which, being private property and somewhat out of the way, is rarely discovered by strangers. Many will say that this is merely because the roots have been carried away, but it is not so, for all through the summer violets have imperfect blossoms which no one would care to gather, but which nevertheless culminate in such a crop of seeds, bursting and scattering when fully ripe, that they invariably take care of themselves in the matter of reproduction when all other circumstances are favourable. The violets cultivated in the Garden Isle are principally Russian, which blossom luxuriantly as a rule from October to April, and amply repay the shelter of a few hand-glasses or a little straw litter when an unusually severe frost or fall of snow acts as a temporary check on their flowering. The hardy varieties suitable for gardens are about thirteen, though the differences between many of these are so minute that only an expert could discover them. Near Beddington, in Surrey, there is a nursery specially devoted to violet growing, and as it lies on the road to nowhere it is not very well known, but is a spot "once found to make a note on."



The perfume of violets is peculiarly difficult to fix artificially, and no essences give their odour pure and simple. Violet vinegar is, however, a delightful though not a very much used adjunct to the toilette. Pliny recommended that a wreath of violets should be worn as a remedy for headache, and violet syrup was an old and innocent English cordial for infants.

Was it not Walter Savage Landor who wrote a delicious little poem about a child who had a violet-root growing in a pot, and watched its buds day by day in the spring-time, till when

At last there came a streak of blue,
'Twas all the world to me!

And does anyone in these days of rush and hurry ever find time to read how Miss Mitford went "violeting" and enjoyed the exquisite perfume steaming and lingering in the moist heavy air, and the sight of "the lovely violets, white and purple, enamelling the short dewy grass, looking but the more vividly coloured under the dull leaden sky"; and, like her, see them with shut eyes, and dream of them when asleep?

It is not necessary to be well read or of poetic temperament to appreciate violets; though the really rustic poor wonder what can induce anyone to buy "sich rubbish." "The country is very pretty when we get near Beaconsfield, is it not?" said a couple of Nature worshippers the other day to a milk-and-roses cheeked girl of whom they asked their way. "Pretty; I don't know. Rather old-fashioned," was the answer. The same sentiment, or lack of it, must have been in the hazy mind of an old Dorsetshire peasant who, watching a lady gathering long-stalked white violets under a hedge, observed, "Tha do seay over to Salisbury volk 'ull give a penny var a handful of theay, but I can't believe as it be trew." John Pounds, the old Portsmouth cobbler, who collected the little "wagabonds" of the courts and alleys, and taught and fed them in his small shop, imbued them with some knowledge and love of Nature; and, during the spring, the smell of leather and cooking in his cramped abode was often overcome by the odour of the sweet "woilets" which the Bills and Bobs of his rough crew ran out to Copnor to gather for their "master."

DS BY THE QUEEN AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

THE QUEEN AND THE GUARDS.

The departure last week of the several battalions of Foot Guards, the Household Troops, to join the forces which will be assembled at Souakim, under command of Lieutenant-General Sir Gerald Graham, for the new Soudan Expedition, was favoured with encouraging personal attentions by her Majesty the Queen, the Prince of Wales, and other members of the Royal family, who inspected different battalions, at Windsor and at Wellington Barracks, St. James's Park, and bade them a hearty farewell, on the days immediately before their embarkation.

On Thursday afternoon, at Windsor Castle, the 3rd battalion of the Grenadier Guards was inspected by the Queen. It was a brilliant scene, the weather, though the air was somewhat cool, being remarkably fine and cheerful, and the sun shining brightly. The scene of the inspection was the Grand Quadrangle of the Castle, to which some privileged spectators were admitted, the company on the north side of the square including Sir John Cowell, Master of the Royal Household, the Marquis of Exeter, Lady Isabella Thomas, Lady Mary Hozier, the Dean of Windsor and Mrs. Randall Davidson, Mr. Legh, of Lyne, Captain Holmes, and several of the Military Knights of Windsor. The principal approach to the Palace as far as the gateway and the streets in the vicinity of the Castle were lined with sightseers, who had assembled to watch the troops pass by. The Eton boys clambered up the eastern half of the grassy, precipitous mound that forms the base of the Round Tower, above which the Royal standard floated in the breeze. Even the pedestal of the equestrian statue was occupied by these adventurous spectators. Here and there the windows of the corridors overlooking the gravelled quadrangle were occupied by the ladies of the Court, and Prince Arthur and Princess Margaret of Connaught sat at one of the windows on the south side of the palace facing the spot where the troops were to assemble.

The battalion, which had paraded at the Victoria Barracks, reached the Castle shortly before four o'clock, having been played from its quarters by the band of the regiment. It was under the command of Colonel the Hon. W. S. D. Home, and consisted of thirty-one officers, a warrant officer, ten colour-sergeants, twenty-three sergeants, sixteen drummers, and 750 rank and file. Officers and men were attired in red serge tunics, dark trousers, sun helmets, and puggarees, and the men carried their marching equipment. A mounted party under Captain St. John Mildmay were dressed in khakee uniforms, helmets, puggarees, putties, and boots, and carried brown leather cartridge bandoliers and sword bayonets instead of the ordinary weapon. The officers wore brown leather boots. Marching under the portcullis gateway at the western entrance, the troops formed in line of half-battalions in the middle of the square and facing the Royal apartments on the south of the Palace. As soon as the battalion had formed, the Queen seated herself at a window of the corridor near the gateway between the York and Lancaster Towers, the battalion presenting arms and the band of the regiment playing the National Anthem on the appearance of her Majesty. With the Queen were Princess Beatrice and Prince and Princess Louis of Battenberg. General Sir H. F. Ponsonby, General Gardiner, and General Gipps, who were in full uniform, Lord Methuen, and Captain Bigge were in attendance in the quadrangle beneath the window occupied by her Majesty. The space being limited, the military movements which followed were of the simplest description, the troops marching past the Queen in open column of companies, to the tune of the "British Grenadiers," and then forming three sides of a square.

Ushered by General Sir H. F. Ponsonby, Colonel the Hon. W. S. D. Home and the officers of the battalion were then conducted into the presence of her Majesty, who addressed them as follows:—"I have summoned you here before your departure to wish you heartily Godspeed. May God protect you in the day of battle. May He preserve you in the time of danger by land and sea, and may He lead you to victory. Confident that my Grenadier Guards will ever maintain the honour and reputation of British soldiers, I rely on your equalling the glorious deeds of those who have lately fought in the distant land to which you are now proceeding. My thoughts and prayers go with you and your brave comrades, to whom, alas! I cannot also bid farewell as I now do heartily to you. Once more, God bless you!"

On the return of the officers to the quadrangle, the Royal speech was repeated to the battalion by the Colonel, at whose request the men gave three cheers for her Majesty.

On Friday morning, before leaving Windsor, this battalion of the Grenadier Guards was inspected by the Prince of Wales, accompanied by Field-Marshal Lord Strathnairn and Colonel Home, at the Victoria Barracks. His Royal Highness briefly addressed them, saying, "I can remember this day thirty-one years ago, when this very battalion left for the Crimea. I remember how well the Guards fought on that occasion; and I know you will uphold the honour of your country. I will not detain you longer, but wish you once more Godspeed, good health, and a safe return."

The Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Princess of Wales, Prince Edward, and Princess Beatrice, inspected the Scots Guards at Wellington Barracks on Saturday morning.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

"A Fishy Case; or, The Scales of Justice," is the title of an operetta for children, written by F. E. Weatherly, and composed by A. J. Caldicott. In each respect this little work is well calculated to interest juvenile performers and audiences, for which purpose it will be found available for drawing-room use. It includes solos and choruses of simple and pleasing character. The operetta was given by thirty children (a less number might suffice) at Torquay, and realised £120 for the Crèche fund. Messrs. Metzler and Co. are the publishers.

"Vesper Music" is the title of a song by Mr. Barnby, in which he has set some suggestive lines to some very expressive music. The plaintive melody in the minor key is well relieved by a change to the major, the piece altogether being well suited to voices of a sympathetic character. It is published by Messrs. Metzler and Co., as also are "The Primrose Path," a song, by A. H. Behrend, in which the melody is of a very pleasing and vocal character—"Nancy" (an "Idyll of the Kitchen"), and "Courting Days," both by A. M. Wakefield, and each containing much marked character.

Messrs. Metzler and Co. have also just issued some sprightly dance music of various forms. "Italia," a dance, by A. Levey; polkas—"Merry little drummers" (with a vocal part), by J. M. Coward; and "The Jersey Lily," by P. Rowe; waltzes—"Langtry," by E. Boggetti; "La Veronese," by A. Levey; and "Princess Beatrice," by G. Lamothe, are all characterised by well-marked dance rhythm.

"Moments of Peace" is the title of a new song, words by E. Oxenford, music by O. Sondermann, which contains, in both respects, much genuine earnest feeling, and is well suited to any singer with a feeling for sentiment. Messrs. Patey and Willis are the publishers.

"Unseen Singers," by Ciro Pinsuti; "The Orphan's Prayer" and "At Prayers," both by B. Tours, are songs replete with flowing melody in the sentimental style and are well worthy of the reputation of the respective composers. Messrs. Osborn and Tuckwood are the publishers, as also of "The Vesper Voluntaries for the Organ, Harmonium, or American Organ"; a series of original pieces in various styles by various composers, well suited for the instruments specified. The work is well engraved and printed, and is published at a very moderate price.

Mr. F. Pitman's "Sixpenny Musical Library" has now nearly reached its seventieth number, and is a marvel of cheapness. A recent part contains twelve of Schubert's exquisite songs, with the pianoforte accompaniments somewhat simplified by R. Rogier, and an English translation of the words by O. Brand.

Mr. E. Ashdown (late Ashdown and Parry) has recently issued some pleasing vocal and instrumental pieces. "Sleep on, my heart" (Lullaby), by J. B. Calkin; "Under the shadow of St. Paul's," by Seymour Smith; "Fleurette," by H. A. Muscat; and "Wishes," by Boyton Smith, are songs of a very expressive kind, that will be welcome in drawing-room circles. "Maritana," by Sydney Smith, is a brilliant fantasia for the pianoforte, in which themes from Wallace's popular opera are very effectively elaborated. "Antwerp," and "Bruges," are two characteristic pianoforte pieces, entitled "Les Carillons Belges," by E. M. Lott, in which there is much piquancy. "Puck," "Romeo and Juliet," and "Ariel," by Seymour Smith, are pianoforte illustrations of Shakspeare, each with a distinctive character. "Gavotte in G," by J. S. Anderson (also published by E. Ashdown), is a very successful imitation of the quaint old dance form.

"Fourth Tarantella," by W. Macfarren (Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.), is a spirited pianoforte piece, in which the impulsive character of the Neapolitan dance is well sustained.

Mr. Trayner, Sheriff of Forfarshire, has been appointed a Judge of the Court of Session, Edinburgh, in succession to Lord Deas, retired.

At the annual dinner of the friends of the Dramatic and Musical Sick Fund, which took place last week at Willis's Rooms, subscriptions were announced to the extent of £900.

The third annual dinner of the London Chamber of Commerce was given at the Cannon-street Hotel on the 19th inst.—Mr. C. Magniac, M.P., in the chair. The Hon. Evelyn Ashley, in proposing "The Colonies," said that the time had gone by when the British colonies were disregarded. The dullest person now recognised their importance and advantages. He alluded to the generous offers made from Australia and Canada to send troops to share our work in the Soudan.—The Chamber has issued a circular explaining its position, as well as the nature of the work in which it is engaged. In the space of three years it has enrolled 1933 members, and realised an annual income of £4000. Seventeen of the Trade associations of the metropolis are affiliated to the Chamber; and it has created eleven Trade Section Committees, representing as many different branches of commerce. One feature of its work is specially worthy of notice: "It has prepared, under legal advice, an agreement of reference which renders arbitration under its by-laws a rule of court, and binding upon the interested parties; whilst it has introduced into the House of Lords a bill for the codification of the Law of Arbitration."

THE DERBY OF THE LEASH.

There is a certain poem of Bret Harte's recounting the feat of a filly, named Chiquita, in swimming a flooded river. A great many verses are devoted to describing her gallant struggles, which terminated in her eventually landing on the further bank minus saddle and bridle, which had been washed off by the force of the current, and then the unimportant fact that the Judge's "nevvy," who rode her, was never seen afterwards, and was very naturally supposed to have been drowned, is dismissed in a couple of lines. We were reminded of this by reading various accounts of the favourite's defeat in the first round of the Waterloo Cup. Mineral Water, who won the great prize last year, and who, it was confidently hoped, would repeat his success this season, began his course against Skittles remarkably well, and had scored several points when "he ran out a bit, and struck against a policeman's legs in so doing." After this accident he performed very tamely, and was beaten easily. It afterwards transpired that he had injured one of his shoulders rather badly, and we have read a great deal with regard to his mishap, the influence it will have on his future engagements, &c.; but, after the most careful research, we cannot find a word as to the effects of the collision on the luckless policeman! The first round was also fatal to Greentick, last year's runner-up, as, after two undecideds, Gay City proved just too good for him in a course of terrible length and severity. Neither of them may ever get over the punishment received; and, in the first ties, Gay City could scarcely make an effort against Petrarch, though the latter had also been very hard run to win his first course. In this round Cocklaw Dean was decidedly unlucky in being beaten by Coralline, for he had a little the better of it when he fell heavily on his head on some plough, and quite destroyed his chance. There were two other unfortunate courses for backers of the favourites. In one of them, Wild Moss disposed of Che Sara; and, in the other, Iowa, with 2 to 1 on her, was well beaten by Clyde Wharf. Luck, however, had nothing to do with either of these results, and in each case the verdict was undoubtedly gained by the better dog. False Standard was the only favourite that was put out in the second ties, and, in this case, Clyde Wharf was again the bookmakers' friend, as he never allowed Mr. Fletcher's representative to score a point in a short spin. False Standard is aptly named, as, except in her puppy season, she has performed in sadly disappointing fashion, always beginning well enough to tempt backers to support her, but invariably failing to get to the end of a stake. The sensational trial of the third ties was that between Skittles and Clamor. The latter had won twenty-two courses in succession during the present season, and was naturally regarded as the best puppy of the year. It is not altogether certain that he has forfeited his claim to that title, as, though Skittles beat him with something to spare, he was considerably handicapped by the hare persistently breaking away from him, and it would be very interesting to see him pitted against Miss Glendyne. The last-named made short work of Clyde Wharf, and established herself a strong favourite. In the fourth ties, Bit o' Fashion disposed of Skittles after an undecided, and Miss Glendyne did what she liked with Ballymoney, who performed very consistently and well throughout. Then, as Bit o' Fashion and Miss Glendyne are in the same kennel, a division was agreed upon, the first that has taken place since Clive and Selby divided the prize in 1859. The Purse requires no comment; and the Plate was only remarkable for the fact of Cocklaw Dean repeating his victory of last year. He ran consistently well throughout, and was singularly unfortunate to be put out of the Cup in such fluky fashion. Though frost threatened to stop proceedings on the last day, little fault could be found with the weather on the whole, and a grand stock of hares gave some splendid trials; indeed, some of them were almost too long and severe. Mr. Hedley judged in his usual masterly fashion, whilst Wilkinson's slipping was all that could be wished; and, though the interest that is taken in this great fixture is clearly on the wane, it can only be set down to the multiplication of inclosed meetings. We append abridged details:—

SKETCHES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS DURING THE DEBATE ON THE VOTE OF CENSURE.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

The Great Fire of 1666 "licked the windows" of the Temple Church, but happily spared that glorious specimen of Norman and Early English architecture. The Round Church, which dates from 1185, and the later church, built fifty-five years afterwards, carry back the memory to days when the Master of the Templars could inflict the most condign punishment on the enemies of the Order; when criminals were flogged publicly before the high altar, and an unhappy man starved to death for disobedience, in a cell so small that he could not even lie down. The church is rich in historic memories, and it was fitting that the dedication of the Round Church 700 years ago should be commemorated last Sunday by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The faults of the Templars were in accordance with the spirit of the age, their ideal was one of which any age might be proud. They were men inspired by a great enthusiasm and sense of duty, virtues which have helped to make England in the ages past, and still live in the race, as Gordon's heroic endurance and self-sacrificing spirit have so lately proved.

Lovers of billiards have a treat in prospect; for Mr. John Roberts, jun., the accepted "champion," and Mr. W. Cook, ex-"champion," have, after a long delay, actually signed an agreement to play a match for a hundred pounds a side and the championship, at the Billiard-Hall, Argyle-street, W. The match is to be a game of 3000 up, instead of the heretofore 1000; in other respects, as regards the balls, the pockets, and so on, the usual conditions are to prevail. The match is to begin on the 30th inst., and end, if possible, April 1; the start is to be made at half-past eight each evening, and one thousand, two thousand, and three thousand, if possible, must be the score of one player before play ceases on each respective occasion.

Until recently, soldiers of all ranks have been permitted to retain their discarded uniforms, to sell them or dispose of them as they pleased. And this regulation has done much towards encouraging neatness and carefulness of clothes in the Army. At Aldershott, the old-clothes dealers have carried on a trade satisfactory alike to vendors and purchasers, and it was but natural that they should pay higher prices for tunics in good order than for those that are practically worn out. Private soldiers have not many perquisites, so it was to have been expected that there should be bitter wailings now that an order has been issued that disused uniforms must be returned to the authorities. Nor is it likely that the Government will get such good prices for their property as the rank and file obtained.

Is the statue of Achilles which was erected in Hyde Park in 1822, and inscribed to "Arthur Duke of Wellington and his brave companions-in-arms, by their country-women," suffering from grief at being separated from his old friend and companion the Iron Duke, removed from Hyde Park Corner to Aldershott? Certainly the bronze hero cast from cannon taken in the battles of Salamanca, Vittoria, Toulouse, and Waterloo, is far from well; and experts thought that he would have given way and fallen flat on his face but for the prompt attention rendered by artisans and metal-workers who are now engaged in doctoring him. At present, he is hidden from gaze beneath a canvas hospital, and will emerge no doubt fully recovered. It will gratify his many admirers to learn that his heel is uninjured in spite of the Greek fable, but that the Styx has proved inefficacious, as the affected part is the supposed invulnerable calf of his leg.

When John Keats, the poet, before his departure to Rome in 1820, where he subsequently died, wrote, in a letter to his lady-love, "the world is too brutal for me," he was suffering from a violent attack which appeared in the Quarterly Review on his poem "Endymion." He has proved to be prophetic, without intending to be so; for the "brutality of the world" was evidenced by the fact that several of his letters to this same Miss Fanny Brawne were treasured by her (not for the purpose of a breach of promise suit), and were submitted to public auction at Messrs. Sotheby's sale-rooms last week. Considering that they were absolutely free from poetic language or gushing avowals, and that they bore the signature in initials J. K. only, they realised good prices. But what would have been the feelings of a nature so sensitive that a bad criticism killed it had it survived to see its own epistles of affection bid for by dealers of curiosities at advances of five shillings a time?

Actors in the habit of undertaking the rôles of heavy villains in melodrama and tragedy justly consider it a tribute to their talent when they are soundly hissed. In country towns it is by no means unusual for excitable members of the audience to allow their feelings to overpower their manners, and shout "Oh, you wretch!" or "the man in the blue shirt did it." Such little episodes, if they cause laughter where sympathy is expected, are at least harmless; but an American story, told of the famous Edwin Booth, shows that an actor may at times be so natural as to place himself in personal jeopardy. The artist was portraying Iago somewhere in the Western States, and his audience consisted chiefly of gold miners costumed in their slouch hats and red shirts. These appreciated him to such an extent that the uproar, hissing, and hooting almost smothered the words of the play. At the end of the second act the indignation of one gentleman in the gallery rose to so high a pitch that he drew his revolver and shot at the traitorous friend. The bullet struck Othello's sword-hilt, and the performance was stopped while the suffering Moor explained that there was really no personal animosity between him and Iago. Then the threats of lynching subsided, but so did the diggers' interest in the play.

Now that Sir George Cornewall Lewis has gone, it is possible to speak, without fear of being brought to book, of persons living to the age of considerably more than a hundred. In a work just published, it is claimed that many gipsies have died at more than a hundred, of whom are mentioned James Smith, in 1822, at 105; Billy Marshall, in 1792, at the incredible age of 120; Anne Day, in 1799, at 108; Mrs. Myrick Lock, date not given, at 101; an anonymous "gipsy woman," date not given, at 104, in "one of the workhouses of Essex"; and a woman named Leatherhead, date not given, at 115, at Tring, Hertfordshire. After this, for the benefit of Sir Wilfrid Lawson and his friends, one is emboldened to refer to Daniel Bull McCarthy, Esquire, of whom it is related that he "could not bear the warmth of a night-shirt, which he put away behind his pillow"; that "in company he drank plentifully of rum and brandy, which he called 'naked truth'"; that if he did condescend to take a glass of claret or other wine, "just to oblige," he "never failed to drink an equal glass of rum or brandy, which he called a 'wedge'"; and that, nevertheless, he died at the great age of 112, at Irreagh, county Kerry, Ireland, in February, 1797. If this gentleman had been a teetotaller he ought, according to the Lawsonian theories, to be alive still; he would only have been 200.

A great topic of conversation in Paris lately among certain circles has been an unfortunate "affair of honour," in which one of the combatants used his left hand to turn aside his adversary's sword. Some people may think that, if you are engaged in deadly combat and wish to preserve your own life, you are at liberty to do anything which is not absolutely treacherous and which it is equally open to your adversary to do; especially if you are not very expert with your weapon, or are unacquainted with all the little laws and etiquette of fencing and of the duel. But this does not appear to be the case; though an instance is cited of a celebrated duellist, hailing from Rennes, who in former days was in the habit of receiving his adversary's point deliberately in his open left hand and then running his adversary comfortably through the stomach or lungs. He, having received a wound, is considered to have been perfectly justified. It is quite clear, however, that even he, though it required some resolution to do what he did, showed most unmistakably that he preferred not to risk his life any more than he could help: yet the point of "going out" is generally supposed to be to risk your life for the sake of your honour.

It is to be feared that there is in human nature an innate meanness which will sooner or later make it almost impossible for any kind of fight to come off between two persons on the strictly honourable and chivalrous principles which King Arthur of the Round Table and the noble-hearted minority would advocate. We saw this in the case of our "prize-fights," which were considered once upon a time to be the highest form of single combat, and were instituted for the encouragement of what was proudly called "the noble art of self-defence." Yet it was found necessary in course of time to make a code of laws, from which it is plain that the heroes of the "twenty-four foot ring," if they were not sharply looked after and had not stringent laws laid down for their guidance, would in a weak moment be tempted to "kick," or "bite," or "gouge," or "hit below the belt," or wear in their shoes "spikes" of inordinate length and sharpness for the purpose of running them through an adversary's toes or foot, and thus obtaining a considerable advantage. Perhaps it is best to have no single combats at all, unless in actual warfare, in which, according to a well-known saying, all is fair, and you may, if you can, shoot your enemy from behind a hedge, and even take him in the rear.

The Spiritualists may be said just now to be holding a carnival. In a recent number of a journal of "occult and mystical research," several triumphs are recorded, the most important of them by far being "an apparition formed in full view." Fourteen people were present on the occasion, and here are some of the phenomena to which they bear witness. The medium comes into the room apparently in a deep trance. Presently, a white, vaporous substance is drawn from his side, covers the ground, rises to a considerable height, and evolves into a form of great majesty and dignity. The figure, which was that of a handsome man, was joined to the medium by a white link, and appeared firm and substantial. He, or it, walked round the circle, shook hands with several people, smiled, but was unable to speak. At length the medium was seen to stagger towards an ante-room from which he had originally emerged, the form going behind him and supporting him. No attempt seems to have been made to follow them, and what became of the handsome "stranger" no one can say. He came and went and left no trace behind. All we know of what passed behind the curtain is that water was asked for by means of rappings, and that the bearer of it "while fumbling in the dark" to reach the medium's mouth, felt "a form" by his side and a gentle guidance of the arm. We suppose it would have been considered unpolite to strike a light at that moment, and thus to reveal the position of the medium and the "figure." These spirits, indeed, are said to shrink from the light, but that is no reason why persons present at a séance should do the same.

It is probable that in the near future Shanklin, at the back of the Isle of Wight, may vie with Cowes as a yachting station. It is in the very centre of the spacious sheltered bay between the points of Culver and Dunnose, and the lord of the manor, whose rent-roll has within the last thirty years increased from one to ten thousand pounds per annum, intends to co-operate with a wealthy resident and yacht-owner in forming a harbour. He has also given a central and valuable piece of land on the Cliff, and a large sum of money, for the erection of a reading-room and winter garden; and, as a new inland road has just been made opening out a lovely tract of country, Shanklin probably has a time of prosperity before it. These and similar improvements have long been needed, and will only just come in time to save a great deal of property from terrible depreciation in value.

Great satisfaction is expressed in Naval circles about the invitation of tenders from private firms for ships of war. Tenders for six unarmoured cruisers like the Scout were received last week at the Admiralty, and the next on the list will be two armour-clads, and five belted cruisers, resembling the Mersey, but larger and with several improvements. This will tend to reduce the distress among the working classes in the North; so that though war is a deplorable necessity, it is one of the evils out of which good may ultimately spring.

It sounds almost incredible that in the middle of February, when New York was experiencing an Arctic temperature, its markets were well supplied with ripe strawberries, tomatoes, and well-grown juicy cucumbers at really moderate prices, as only about twopence each was asked for the strawberries, and the vegetables were proportionately cheaper. They all came from Florida, where the beauty of the climate and the low rate of transport to the Empire City make market gardening a most profitable occupation.

The sale of the Fournier bric-à-brac on the 2nd inst. created quite an excitement among Parisian lovers of china. The Baroness Solomon de Rothschild, Mesdames de Courval, the Duc de la Force, Champfleury, Watelin, and other connoisseurs, were all there, and the bidding was very brisk indeed. Everything sold was genuine Sèvres pâte tendre, and the Sèvres Museum secured some splendid specimens. Madame de Rothschild was also very fortunate, and is an admirable judge of what she buys. A magnificent rose-coloured pot pourri, with a medallion of men drinking, executed in the style of Teniers, was knocked down to M. Stein for £488; and two jardinières for bulbs, decorated by Vieillard, were bought for £340. A pair of pink and gold baskets, dated 1756, were sold for £160. A dark-blue cup with two handles, and its saucer, with gold dent-de-loup brims, was purchased by M. Malinet for £90.

It has always been supposed that the Philadelphia Mint was a shining example to the Mints of all other countries, on account of its admirable system of checks and other precautions, which made theft of the precious metals consigned to it for coinage utterly impossible. A bar of pure silver, weighing 85 lb., was, however, in some way abstracted from it between Jan. 20 and Feb. 15, and offered for sale in New York to a professional refiner, who from the marks and numbers on it knew at once whence it came, and that it had no business ever to have left Philadelphia, except in the shape of dollars. He therefore handed it to the Sub-Treasury, whose officials declared that the occurrence was absolutely unprecedented, but declined to give any inkling of the mode in which the State would endeavour to trace it. This reticence bears the stamp of practical wisdom; for the detection of crimes is often rendered impossible because the thieves, together with the rest of the public, read in the papers every move that is made against them, and are consequently able to baffle justice altogether.

Ladies will not universally hail the rage for greens which possesses the leaders of fashion at the present moment, for the simple reason that green does not suit every complexion. No less than six new shades of this colour are announced from Paris for spring wear—viz., watercress, emerald (principally made in silk), silvery moss, young sorrel, and lentil, cooked and raw. The French appellations of course are prettier, but these are the English equivalents. The latest name for a new style of train for evening dresses is ailes de hanneton, or cockchafer's wings.

It is reported, and whoever chooses may believe, that a rich American offered M. Paul Aumont, the other day, two hundred and fifty thousand francs (ten thousand pounds) for the "sensational" race-horse Fra Diavolo, and that M. Aumont refused the offer. Fra Diavolo became "sensational" by his defeat for the Prix de Longchamps on April 6 last year, when, with odds betted on him, he did not go the whole course, and was said to have been "nobbled." He ran third to Little Duck and Archiduc for the French Derby, and to Little Duck and The Lambkin for the Grand Prix de Paris, and was at the outset commonly believed to be the best French horse of his year. Even so, however, ten thousand pounds would be a big price for him; but, on the other hand, there is no saying what sort of horse some people will not give ten thousand pounds for, since that sum is said to have been paid for The Prince, son of Balfe, and to have been offered for Paradox, who has as yet won only one race, and that under favourable circumstances. It is to be hoped that Paradox will not supply a justification, as it were, of his name by imitating the career of The Prince.

"Purveyors" of milk are causing error to arise by sending about their milk-carts with "koumiss" printed upon the outside of the vehicles. Ingenuous spectators are under the impression that the word is a new expression for milk, and is to be pronounced "cow-mess."

A correspondent points out that a Note in our last issue was in part wrong, and we willingly give the correction, as follows:—"Though I quite agree with the paragraph that it is a pity when medals and other relics pass out of the family whose ancestors won them, I beg to tell you that you are misinformed as to the medals in the case you allude to having been purchased by strangers for a mere song. The medals in question were bequeathed to Lord Berkeley by his brother-in-law, the late General Randel Rumley. On hearing of the intended sale of Lord Berkeley's effects, General Rumley's nephew, Mr. Robert Dennis, being aware how his uncle had prized the medals, telegraphed to Messrs. Trollope to secure them for him at any price. Messrs. Trollope's agent was late for "lot 109," consisting of three medals and an order, which were sold to a dealer for a comparatively small sum. The other medals were secured for Mr. Dennis for £249 13s. 6d., including fees. One medal, at least, was General Rumley's own winning, so it was returned to his family."

THE SILENT MEMBER.

A turn of the political kaleidoscope has transferred public interest from the critical Parliamentary divisions of last week to the terse hometruths of Prince Bismarck in Berlin, and to the threatened collision of Russian and Afghan troops on the frontier of Afghanistan. The sketches and letters of Mr. William Simpson, the Special Artist of The Illustrated London News at the Afghan frontier, have prepared the readers of this Journal for the present crisis, which everybody hopes will be tided over without further friction, although there has unquestionably been great excitement in military circles in this country. While a little judicious reining-in on the part of the Russian authorities may put an end to the prevailing anxiety, an amende should still be made for the discourtesy, not to put too fine a point on it, of keeping Sir Peter Lumsden for so long a period waiting for the Russian Commissioner. Perhaps, the best amende would be for the tardy representative of Russia to be the bearer of his own apology. The ticklish question of frontier delimitation has been so many times settled satisfactorily between Russian and British officers that the geographical difficulties of the existing problem would doubtless soon disappear were Sir Peter Lumsden but in a position to define the boundary in conjunction with his Russian colleague.

The explanation the Foreign Secretary had to offer the Marquis of Salisbury last Tuesday in the House of Lords on this very point was fortuitously prefaced by an apt statement on the part of the Earl of Kimberley. The noble Earl the Secretary for India, in informing the Earl of Camperdown that the Nizam of Hyderabad, the Begum of Bhopal, the Rajah of Puttiala, and the Rajah of Jheend, Mohammedan and Sikh States in India, had proffered military assistance in aid of the Expedition to the Soudan, could not say offhand whether the offers would be accepted; but he was cheered when he earnestly added, "I am quite certain that the recollection of them will strengthen our position in India, as well as the ties which bind us to those native States."

Earl Granville's answer on Tuesday to Lord Salisbury's question—"one of the very greatest importance," as the noble Earl admitted—was of sufficient moment to be quoted:—

According to the latest reports received from Sir Peter Lumsden, the Russian outposts have occupied the Zuffikar Pass, about twenty miles to the south of Pul-i-Khatun, Akrobat, between Zuffikar and the river Khushk, and Sari-Yazi. A post of Yulatan Turkomans has also been stationed at Pul-i-Khisti, a few miles north of Penjdeh, by Colonel Alikhanoff, who, after placing them, has retired, presumably to Sari-Yazi. Representations are being made to the Russian Government earnestly pressing them to give stringent orders to their military commanders to refrain from any further forward movements which would bring about a collision between the Afghan and Russian outposts. The Russian Government, in reply to a remonstrance from her Majesty's Government, declined on the 24th ult. to withdraw from their advanced posts at Sari-Yazi and the Zuffikar Pass, but gave assurances that their officers had been ordered carefully to avoid conflicts with the Afghans, and that complications were only to be feared in the event of the Afghans attacking the Russian posts. Sir Peter Lumsden, who has exerted himself to prevent any collision, has advised the Afghans to maintain themselves in the positions now occupied by them. This advice has been approved by her Majesty's Government, and he has been instructed to urge them at the same time not to advance beyond their present positions.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice made a similar statement in the House of Commons on Tuesday. From both these official statements, it was made clear that the Russians had advanced within a distinctly "measurable distance" of Herat.

Harking back to the first Vote-of-Censure debates of the Session, one may note that on Thursday week the Marquis of Salisbury opened his vigorous and unsparing attack upon the Government in the House of Lords before a full and brilliant assemblage. There was a goodly gathering of peeresses to enliven the side galleries; Privy Councillors from the Lower House congregated in front of the Throne; and the Prince of Wales was present on the front cross-bench to nod approval of the clear articulation and incisive style of the noble Marquis. Quite apart from agreement or non-agreement with the opinions of the Leader of the Opposition in the Lords, it is impossible to withhold admiration for the lucidity and point of his speeches, or the exemplary distinctness of his delivery in a House where mumbling and inaudible speech are too prevalent. Lord Salisbury arraigned the Ministry on the grounds "that the deplorable failure of the Soudan expedition to attain its object has been due to the undecided councils of the Government, and to the culpable delay attending the commencement of operations; and that the policy of abandoning the whole of the Soudan after the conclusion of military operations will be dangerous to Egypt and inconsistent with the interests of the Empire." On the part of what the noble Marquis designated the "divided and hopelessly halting Ministry," the Earl of Northbrook with smug confidence defended what had been done in the Soudan; and the Earl of Derby, in an equally characteristic speech, prayed in a manner that his colleagues and himself might be let down gently, on the score that Ministers, like mortals, were liable to err. On the second and closing night of the debate, the Government were further assailed by Lord Camperdown from the Ministerial side, by the Earl of Carnarvon in his most slashing style, and by Lord Harris in a neat maiden speech, which betokened (to use a Constitutional Club simile) that the famous Kentish Cricketer may knock the arguments of Ministerial Lords about as skilfully as he floors the wickets in the field. As a whole, the debate sustained the high reputation of the House. From the able speech of the Duke of Richmond to the Marquis of Salisbury's crushing rejoinder to Earl Granville, the addresses were worthy the occasion. Although the Foreign Secretary explicitly stated that when the Mahdi had been "smashed," then would be the time to set up an orderly form of government in the Soudan, the majority of their Lordships would have given Ministers but short shrift had they had their will. By the large majority of 121—189 against 68 votes—was the Marquis of Salisbury's adverse resolution carried on the Friday night.

Attacked boldly in front by the recognised Opposition, assailed on the right flank by the Radical wing following the lead of Mr. John Morley, and harassed in the rear by file-firing from those uncommonly candid friends, Mr. Goschen and Mr. Forster, the Prime Minister and his colleagues did not look altogether comfortable on the Treasury Bench, while their policy in the Soudan, culminating in the lamented death of General Gordon and the fall of Khartoum, was being censured. Ministers, nevertheless, put as brave a front to their swarming foes as the "tiny square" of British redcoats and bluejackets did to the hosts of the Mahdi on the occasion of the heroic march to El Gubat. The fire and earnestness with which Mr. Gladstone, full, apparently, of the ardour of renewed youth, rebutted the assault of Sir Stafford Northcote on the opening night, I referred to last week. Both the Leader of the House and the Leader of the Opposition are portrayed in the group of Parliamentary Sketches. From the point of view of the memorable Midlothian speeches, the admirable deliverances of Mr. John Morley and Mr. Henry Labouchere were by far the best of the week. The best of a bad case was made by Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Trevelyan, Sir Charles Dilke (who trenchantly answered Sir Robert Peel's lively sally), and the Marquis of Hartington; but they made few, if any, converts. The censures dropped severely upon them by Mr. Goschen and Mr. Forster from their Olympian heights, and the cold silence of the Parnellite party below the gangway on the Opposition side, did not encourage Ministers. Resounding cheers broke forth when, in an overflowing House, towards the small hours of Saturday morning, the result of the division was made known. Liberal cheers were lustily responded to by the counter-cheering of the Conservatives when the numbers were announced at the table—288 for Sir Stafford Northcote's vote of censure, and 302 against: a majority of 14 only for the Government. There were next 112 votes given in favour of, and 455 against (343 majority), Mr. John Morley's so-called "scuttling" amendment. Lord George Hamilton's adverse amendment, more stringently worded than Sir Stafford Northcote's, was lastly defeated by a majority of 22—299 against 277—before the Commons were permitted to go home. The Irish Home-Rule Party are sketched as they gregariously followed their leader, Mr. Parnell, in the wake of the Conservative Opposition.

The Cabinet met on Saturday to deliberate. Notwithstanding the smallness of the majority, Ministers gallantly decided to bear the unenviable burdens of office a little longer. Mr. Gladstone was conspicuous by his absence from the Treasury bench on Monday, when Lord Hartington explained that the Prime Minister was indisposed. On Tuesday, however, the Premier, although still suffering from his cold, resumed his seat in the House. The right hon. gentleman, who looked very pale and worn, and walked with a stick, was cheered from both sides. As regards the business of Parliament, it may briefly be stated that on Monday both Houses agreed to her Majesty's messages calling out the Reserves and the Militia (Mr. Labouchere's opposing amendment in the Commons being defeated by a majority of 130); that on Tuesday the Speaker easily suppressed Mr. Sexton when the latter irregularly sought to impugn the conduct of the Chair without notice; and on the same evening, when the motion was made that the Redistribution Bill should go into committee, the following amendment of Sir John Lubbock was negatived by a majority of 103—134 against 31 votes:—

That it be an instruction to the committee that they have power in all cases where an elector is entitled to one vote only to enable the elector to nominate more than one candidate, to whom, under certain circumstances, that vote might be transferred in the manner indicated by the elector.

When the division was taken on Sir J. Hay's motion—"That it is inexpedient that the numbers of this House shall be increased, and, in the opinion of this House, Ireland will be sufficiently represented by ninety members and Wales by twenty-five members"—it was found that this proposal also had been defeated by a good round number—132 against 25, a majority of 107. It is understood that when the Redistribution Bill is passed, and other necessary business has been transacted, the Session will be closed as early as possible—that is, if the Government should survive.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, March 4.

No material change has taken place in the condition of the Money Market. The maintenance of the Bank rate of discount at 4 per cent would appear to be perfectly justified by the state of political relations, in spite of the high figure reached by the reserve of notes and coin in the institution, the amount being considerably above the experience for several years past. The expenditure in connection with the Soudan operations has also to be considered by the directors of the Bank, and as the supply of cash available in the open market is small in the extreme, it is only because of the excessive smallness of the home requirements that rates have sunk down to the level current at the present time. The action of the Bank, therefore, appears perfectly warranted, although of course when the dividends in the Funds are liberated the market will in all probability further break away from the official standard. Some further sums of gold have arrived from abroad, and the New York exchange keeps favourable.

Political considerations have continued to control the Stock Markets, and though at times an appearance of more cheerfulness sets in, it is quickly succeeded by fresh rumours of a disquieting nature, with the result that the downward movement makes further progress on balance. The home funds have again receded, as have also Colonial and Indian Government loans. The movements in foreign Government bonds have been against holders, Russian falling to 1 in several cases; Turkish have, however, shown marked firmness. Poor traffics and the quietness of trade generally have prejudiced home railways, Metropolitan District being specially flat. A satisfactory feature of the week has been the steady buying of American railway securities of the best class—that is to say, of those issues which have passed through the recent trying ordeal without attracting any suspicion as to the due payment of the dividends. A general advance is shown in nearly all the best-known descriptions, and as these securities are out of the reach of European complications, the upward course may be expected to continue, unless, of course, some fresh incident should crop up to check the improvement. Reports have been current of more activity in trade in Mexico, and the Mexican railway stocks have had a substantial rise. The demand for Bryant and May shares and the advance in Suez Canal shares have been among the chief features in other securities; but an adverse movement of interest is a continued fall in Hudson Bay shares, which is due no doubt to a presumption that the reduced price of furs will materially affect the dividend. The shares began the year at 25, and were to-day dealt in at 19½.

For the past half-year the Caledonian Railway Company will pay 4¾ per cent per annum, this dividend comparing with 5 for the period to Jan. 31 last year. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway distribution is to be at the rate of 4¼ per cent per annum, as against 5¼.

A new Chinese loan for £1,535,000, negotiated through the Hong-Kong and Shanghai Bank, calls for some remark. The price of issue has been fixed at 98 per cent, which is the same rate as that of the loan brought out in December, 1877, just paid off; but the interest on the present occasion is to be 7 per cent per annum, while it was then 8. The information as to Chinese financial affairs is very slight, but past experience as to the loans of the Celestial Empire has been favourable, all engagements having been most faithfully kept, thus auguring well for the present issue.

The chairman of the Merchant Bank of London made some reassuring statements regarding the future, while reminding his hearers that it was the first occasion since the incorporation of the company, some twenty-one years ago, that the directors had been unable to declare a liberal dividend. While large profits were being earned, the shareholders were quite satisfied with the character of the business the bank is largely engaged in, and though they may feel greatly disappointed now that adversity has come, they have no reason for complaint against those having the management of affairs, but must hope for a revival of prosperous times.

At the meeting of the Union Bank of Spain, the motion for the voluntary winding up of the company was lost, 172 shareholders, holding 8919 shares, with 1486 votes, being against; and 86 shareholders, holding 10,507 shares, with 1694 votes, being in favour of winding up. A resolution for a voluntary liquidation requires to be carried by at least three fourths of the members entitled to vote.

THE CHURCH.

The project for the creation of a Bishopric in Fiji, although approved by the Primate, met with unexpected difficulties, and has therefore been abandoned.

The Stratford-on-Avon Town Council have reversed their decision of last week, and agreed to contribute 200 guineas in aid of restoring the church in which Shakspeare was baptised and buried.

The Ven. Archdeacon Blunt, Honorary Chaplain to the Queen, and Vicar of Scarborough, York, has been appointed Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, in the room of the Rev. Dr. Butler, translated to the Deanery of Exeter.

The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's have received the congé d'élire from the Crown directing them to elect a new occupant for the See of London, and the election has been fixed for March 9.

Sir H. W. Gore-Booth has presented to the Rev. Henry F. Gore-Booth, Curate of St. Saviour's, Hoxton, to the living of the Sacred Trinity Church, Salford, of the value of over £1000 a year, void by the death of the Rev. Capel Wolseley.

In commemoration of the 700th anniversary of the consecration of the Round Church, the Archbishop of Canterbury preached at the morning service at the Temple Church on Sunday. The celebration of the anniversary will be completed on Sunday next, when Dr. Vaughan will preach the sermon.

The Archbishop of Canterbury presided last Saturday at a meeting of past and present Wellingtonians, held at Lambeth Palace, to consider a scheme for inaugurating a mission in connection with the college in a destitute district of London. It was decided that the Wellington College Mission should labour in St. Peter's, Walworth, and the school fund guaranteed £150 a year for five years.

Lord Norton presided on Thursday week at the second annual meeting of the Church Schools Company, held in the rooms of the National Society, and, in moving the adoption of the report, expressed satisfaction at the success achieved by the company during its brief period of work. Ten schools, it appeared, were opened, with about 400 pupils, and 2000 additional shares were taken up during the year.

A memorial to the late Archbishop Tait was presented to Edinburgh University yesterday week. It consists of a bust in bronze, built against the eastern façade of the new University buildings, near which the Archbishop was born. The memorial was handed over to the custody of the University authorities by Lord Balfour, and Sir William Muir, Principal of the University, accepted it. The proceedings were witnessed by a large company.

Several additions have been made to the issue for the current year of that most useful work of reference, "The Clergy Directory," published by Mr. T. G. Johnson, of 121, Fleet-street. Among others, it may be noted that not only are the names of chaplains of the regular Army and Navy given, but those of the Volunteer regiments, while a copy of that document "so often heard about, but very seldom seen," the congé d'élire from her Majesty to the Dean and Chapter of a vacant Bishopric, is prefixed.

The Archbishop of Canterbury presided over the annual meeting of the Clergy Orphan Corporation, held yesterday week in the board-room of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, Delahay-street, Westminster. The committee's report stated that there was a deficiency of receipts over expenditure for the year of £1024. Satisfactory reports were given by the examiners of the efficiency of the teaching in both the boys' and the girls' schools. The total number of children in the school is 196, 105 boys and 91 girls.

The friends and parishioners of the late Canon Evans have paid a very graceful tribute to his memory by placing a most beautiful and costly memorial in St. Mary's Church, Grassendale. By the general consent of the congregation, and in accordance with the wish of the relatives of Canon Evans, it was decided that the three east windows should be replaced by others of superior character. Messrs. Heaton, Butler, and Bayne were intrusted with this work, and the utmost credit is due to them for the manner in which it has been executed. The "Adoration of the Lamb" forms the subject represented in the three windows. A handsome brass plate mounted on polished marble has been let into the centre of the chancel floor, and bears the following inscription:—"These windows were given by parishioners and friends to the glory of God and in memory of John Evans, M.A., First Vicar of Grassendale and Honorary Canon of Liverpool. From July, 1853, to January, 1884, Vicar."

Mr. Scrivener, who was formerly Director-General of Customs in Egypt, and has since been Surveyor of Customs at Belfast, has been appointed Controller and Inspector-General of Customs at Liverpool.

Mr. William Russell, of Barnwell, Northampton, has given £5000 to the authorities of the University of St. Andrew, to found entrance bursaries in memory of his brother and himself, both having received their education at St. Andrew's.

Mr. Sheriff Faudel Phillips presided at the fifty-third anniversary festival of the Linen and Woollen Drapers' Institution yesterday week, when, in answer to a special appeal, the sum of £2776 was subscribed.

The Cobden Club silver medal for Political Economy in the University of Bombay has been awarded this year to Pestanji Jámásji Pádshák, of Elphinstone College, the brother of B. J. Pádshák, who won last year's medal.

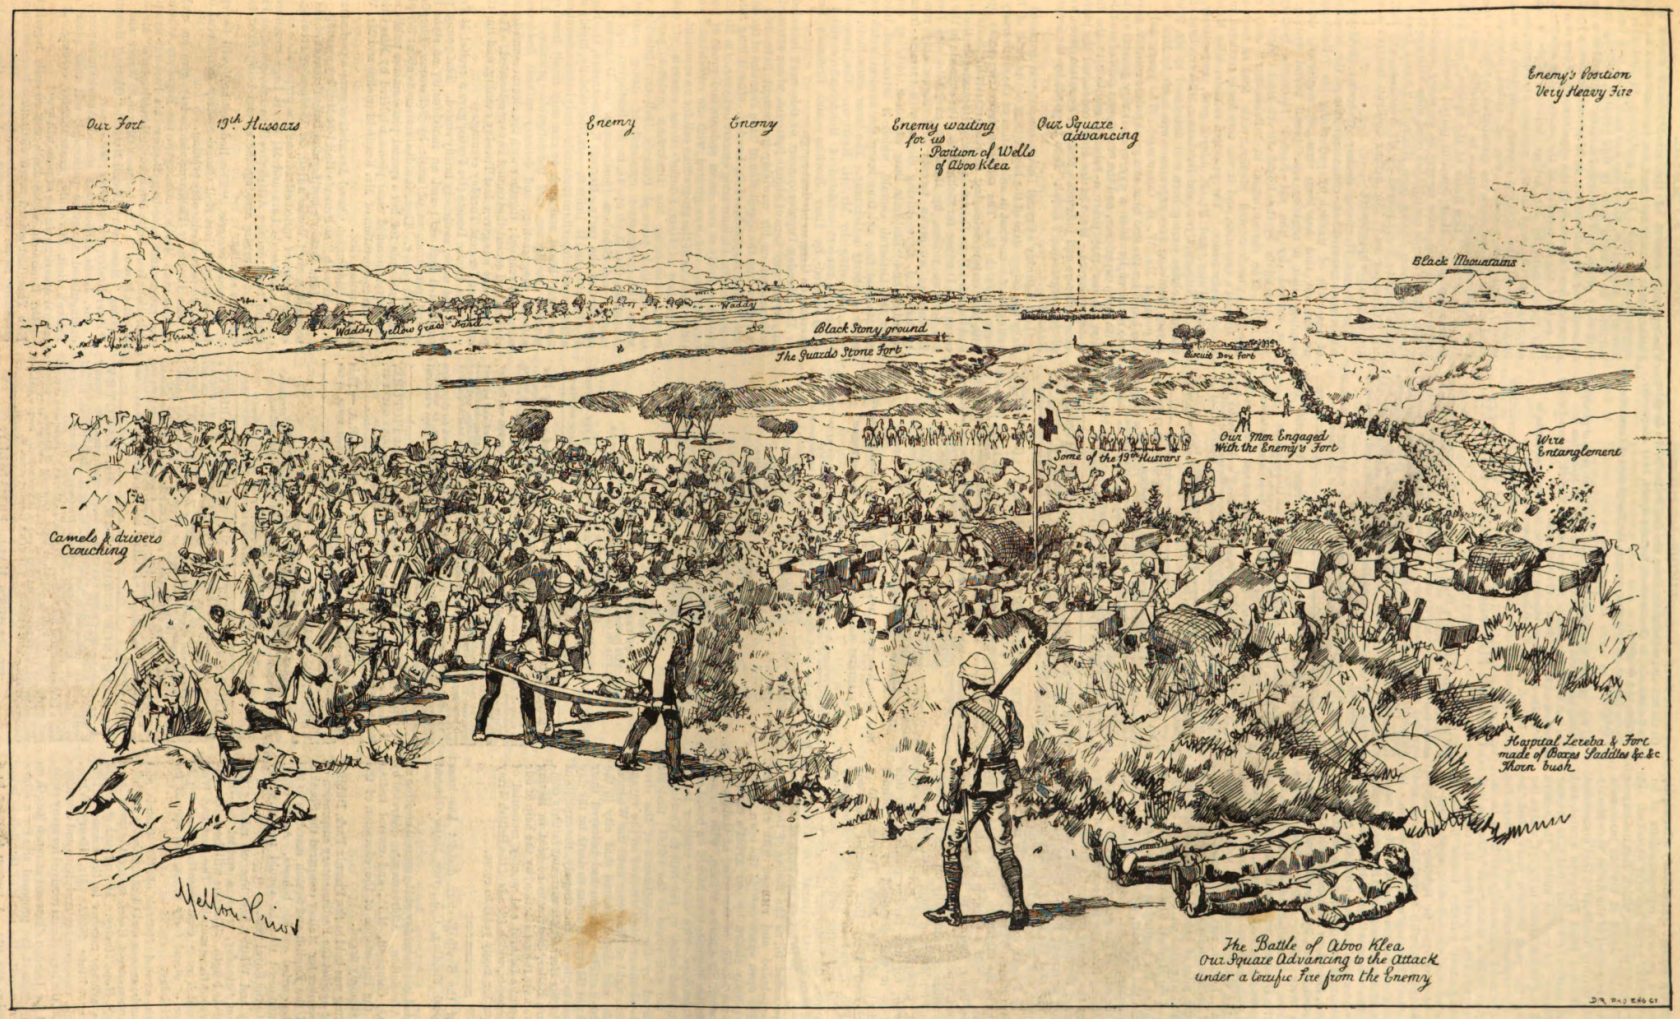
According to the official returns, the Army Estimates for 1885-6 amount to £17,820,700, being a net decrease of £84,900 compared with last year. No provision is, however, made for the Soudanese War expenditure, which will be met by a special vote.

A terrible catastrophe occurred at Shoeburyness on Thursday week, in carrying out experiments with fuses. One of these was being screwed into a shell, when it exploded, killing the gunner on the spot. Colonel Lyons and Colonel Fox-Strangways were so seriously injured that both have since died, as have Captain Goold-Adams, Sergeant-Major Dakyn, and Gunner Underwood. Several others were wounded.

The annual festival of the Royal Masonic Benevolent Institution was held last week at Freemasons' Tavern—Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, M.P., Provincial Grand Master for Gloucestershire, in the chair. There was a large assemblage of brethren from all parts of the country. The total subscriptions announced amounted to £17,636, of which sum London sent up £9810. The chairman's province of Gloucestershire sent up over £2000.

The first half-yearly meeting for 1885 of the Roman Catholic Union of Great Britain was held yesterday week at Willis's Rooms. The Duke of Norfolk, president of the Union, was in the chair, and there was a good attendance of members. The proceedings began by the unanimous re-election of the Duke of Norfolk as president, upon the motion of the Earl of Denbigh, seconded by Mr. Bellingham, M.P. A discussion then took place as to the best means of promoting the formation of Catholic men's societies.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. MELTON PRIOR.



THE EVE OF THE BATTLE OF ABOU KLEA—THE GUARDS BUILDING A STONE WALL AS A DEFENCE.

Sir Herbert Stewart and Staff. Captain Rhodes and Major Wardrop.

FIRST VIEW OF THE ENEMY AT ABOU KLEA.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.—THE BATTLE OF ABOU KLEA: OUR SQUARE ADVANCING TO THE ATTACK.
SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. MELTON PRIOR.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

The retreat of the column of British troops under General Sir Redvers Buller across the Bayuda Desert from Metammeh to Korti has been effected without disaster, and is now to be followed by the retirement of General Brackenbury's column down the Nile, abandoning the intended advance to Abou Ahmed. This sentence briefly sums up the account of military operations during the past week. All Lord Wolseley's army, at the front, seems about to be concentrated, for the present, on that part of the Nile which is between Debbeh and Merawi; and there is apparently no idea of approaching Berber till after the hot season, when Sir Gerald Graham's force, to be landed at Souakim, might be enabled to co-operate with the forces on the Nile.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, who accompanied Sir Herbert Stewart's advanced force, including the Camel Corps, in its march from Korti over the Desert, and witnessed the battle of Abou Klea, on Jan. 17, the battle of the 19th on the further march to Abou Kru and Gubat, and the attempt, on the 21st, to take the town of Metammeh, has sent us his admirable Sketches of those engagements, which appear in this week's publication. They represent, successively, a scene at Abou Klea on the eve of the first battle, when the Guards of the Camel Corps were employed in building a rough wall of stones for the defence of the encampment; the first sight of the enemy next morning; the actual conflict at Abou Klea, where the British square, having left its fortified position, moved forward, under a heavy fire, to attack the enemy, who numbered eight or ten thousand; and the yet fiercer battle fought two days afterwards, on Monday, Jan. 19, when Sir Herbert Stewart was mortally wounded, and many of our officers and soldiers were killed, besides Mr. Cameron and Mr. St. Leger Herbert, correspondents of the Standard and of the Morning Post. Our Illustration of this second battle, which may be called either that of Abou Kru or of Gubat, the former being a place nearer to the battle-field, the latter being the place on the banks of the Nile, above Metammeh, which was gained by this victory for the site of the intrenched camp formed immediately afterwards, is one of the most effective pictorial representations of an actual conflict that any Special Artist has ever sketched. It has been reproduced by a rapid process, which does not impair the lifelike vigour and realistic effect of touches made with the pencil while the heart and mind of the Artist were freshly impressed with a hundred stirring incidents of that memorable scene. Mr. Prior has attended great European armies, and has beheld and depicted battles of regular armies, in the war between Russia and Turkey, as well as most of the British military actions in West and South Africa, in Egypt, and in the Eastern Soudan, during the past thirteen years; but the fulness and vivacity of his representation, and we believe the accuracy of its details, are most successfully exhibited in the present instance. Conflict with a courageous barbarian host is an affair different in many of its aspects from the calculated encounter of highly organised military forces belonging to civilised nations; and the characteristic appearance of such tactics as must be employed in fighting the brave Arabs of the Soudan is displayed with remarkable force and truth in our Special Artist's Drawing upon this occasion. It will be observed that his Sketch or the series of Sketches made during the engagement, afterwards combined in one panoramic view, was taken from the "zereba" or inclosure of prickly mimosa-bush hedges, where the camels lay huddled together, and where the field-hospitals and other non-combatant departments were stationed, but where they nevertheless suffered considerably from the enemy's fire, by which two of the newspaper correspondents were killed. The defence of the "zereba," which is shown in the left-hand portion and in the foreground of Mr. Prior's Drawing, was greatly assisted by the two mountain screw-guns under Major Norton, R.A., and by Lord Charles Beresford with the Naval Brigade and the Gardner machine-gun; while the Guards and other soldiers, under Captain Lord Cochrane, held a sort of advanced redoubt, hastily constructed of such materials as the camp afforded, which were chiefly some piles of biscuit-boxes arranged as a rampart. The dead and wounded on our side were brought into the "zereba"; and Sir Herbert Stewart, who was struck down by a fatal bullet at the beginning of the engagement, is seen lying just within the rampart, attended by one of the surgeons. These gentlemen, Messrs. Briggs, Harding, and Parke, are busy with the care of the sufferers as they come in, while showers of bullets fly into the inclosure, which is surrounded on all sides by the enemy constantly firing from the bush at no great distance. Beyond, in the middle background, is perceived the moving square of British troops (the Guards were in front, the Marines and the Heavy Cavalry men of the Camel Corps on the right, the Mounted Infantry on the left, but all on foot, and the Sussex Regiment in the rear) under command of Colonel Sir Charles Wilson. During an hour and a half, till half-past four in the afternoon, this body of troops, slowly advancing down the valley towards the Nile, which is discerned to the right hand, flowing to Metammeh, in our Artist's View, withstood repeated "rushes" of the dauntless Arab spearmen and swordsmen, principally on the left front, and mowed down many hundreds of them with volleys fired by whole companies, preserving the strictest order. We have not space, however, for any further comment on this battle of Jan. 19, since it was described by Mr. Bennet Burleigh, correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, in a letter that we borrowed from that journal for our own publication of Feb. 7, and to which our readers may again be referred. The remaining subjects of our Illustrations this week continue the history of the same portion of the British forces after their arrival at Gubat. On Wednesday, Jan. 21, an attempt was made to attack the town of Metammeh; but it was not persisted in, as the houses of that town were found to be loop-holed and manned with riflemen, whose fire swept a wide open space outside the town. This situation of affairs is plainly shown by our Artist's Sketch. He contributes also the Sketch of the scene at Gubat, on Saturday, the 24th, when Sir Charles Wilson, with a small escort of men of the Sussex Regiment, embarked on board one of General Gordon's steamers, with another steamer in its company, to go a hundred miles up the Nile to Khartoum. Our readers are but too well aware of the result; that Sir Charles Wilson, delayed by the impediments of the river navigation, one of his steamers being wrecked on the voyage up, did not arrive within sight of Khartoum until the Wednesday morning, Jan. 28, and that he found that city in the possession of the Mahdi. The garrison had betrayed their commander, and had put General Gordon to death on the day before. Though too late to prevent this tragedy, the exploits of the gallant force led by Sir Herbert Stewart, and latterly commanded by Sir Redvers Buller, deserve to be held in lasting remembrance; and we have the satisfaction, by the help of our Special Artist, to present a faithful and worthy memorial of those soldierly achievements, which friends of the British Army will preserve in honour for many years to come.

The command of the South-Eastern district has been given to Major-General Fielding, C.B., vice Major-General Newdigate, C.B.

Lord Ripon presided last Saturday at the annual meeting of the National Indian Association. Addresses were delivered by the chairman, Sir G. Campbell, M.P., and several Indian gentlemen, in which the importance of the education of the natives in India was strongly urged.

An open-air meeting was held in the Phœnix Park, Dublin, on Sunday, to protest against the Parliamentary suspension of Mr. O'Brien. The member for Mallow compared the Speaker to Judge Lynch, and the English and Scotch members to the irresponsible mob who carried out his behests. At the close, the Lord Mayor announced that he should not give any official countenance to the Royal visit.

The Scarborough and Whitby new line of railway was informally opened on Saturday, when a special passenger train was run the whole length. The line will be fully completed for traffic in about three months.—The East and West Junction Railway, which runs from Stratford-on-Avon to Blisworth, a distance of about forty miles, was opened for passenger traffic on Monday.

The twenty-ninth annual festival of the friends and supporters of the Warehousemen and Clerks' Schools was held last week, at the Cannon-street Hotel, under the presidency of the treasurer, Mr. S. Hope Morley. The annual statement pointed out that the average number in the schools in 1884 was 190, and the expenditure £6882. Mr. Henry White, secretary to the schools, announced subscriptions and donations to the amount of £3400, the largest sum received for many years.

The School Board for London discussed at much length on Thursday week the question of the proposed site for a school in Green-terrace, Clerkenwell—the result of the debate being a resolution to abandon the site. A motion to refer to a special committee the estimates as to additional expenditure incurred by the new pupil teachers' scheme was, after a long discussion, agreed to. A bequest amounting to £1000 or £1500 was announced to have been left by Mr. Alfred Tylor, late of Newgate-street, to be yearly applied to the foundation and support of one or a number of scholarships for boys and girls.

NEWS FROM NICE.—With the exception of a very few wet and cold days, the weather is again splendid. Not a flake of snow has fallen. The sun shines almost perpetually, and the influence of the warm rays makes life enjoyable to all, and more especially to those who have by impaired health sought its influence.
There are no epidemics, and the average mortality of the city in 1884 was less per mille than London and many fashionable towns in England.
The streets, roads, and sewers are constantly cleansed and disinfected, and watered from the mountain stream of the Vesubie. There are three English doctors and physicians in practice here—viz., Messrs. West, Wakefield, and Sturge, and they will be happy to communicate with any intending visitors as to the healthfulness of the town.
The effects of the recent storm (the like of which has been unknown for thirty-five years) were comparatively trifling, and repaired in twenty-four hours. In some few low-lying rooms and cellars, near the Fish Market, the wash from the spent waves had entered, but this was soon pumped out by the firemen and military.

MUSIC.

The opening concert of the seventy-third season of the Philharmonic Society occurred too late last week to admit of comment until now. It is gratifying to find this time-honoured institution, which has had such long and beneficial influence on musical taste in this country, holding its way with every prospect of continued success. Instead of a change of conductor at each concert, as in recent seasons, a judicious alteration has been made by the appointment of one conductor for each of the six concerts of the series. The acceptance of this appointment by Sir Arthur Sullivan offers a strong assurance of efficiency in the musical arrangements. The programme of the opening concert comprised no absolute novelty, but the selection was of varied interest. The excellence of the orchestra was manifested in effective renderings of Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalie" and that by Weber known as "The Ruler of the Spirits," and Brahms's third symphony. Herr Joachim played Beethoven's violin concerto with the same success as on many occasions, and Mdlle. Elly Warnots contributed vocal solos with much effect, the pieces chosen having been Handel's "Sweet Bird" (the flute obbligato finely played by Mr. Svendsen), and Bellini's aria "Come per me." Sir Arthur Sullivan received a warm greeting on his appearance.

The Sacred Harmonic Society yesterday (Friday) week rendered its tribute to the commemoration of the bicentenary of the birth of Handel by performing his "Belshazzar," an oratorio that has been strangely neglected, notwithstanding that it contains some grand choral writing. It was revived by the old Sacred Harmonic Society in 1847, and again by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society in 1873. The choral music in "Belshazzar" may compare, in grandeur and science, with that of any other of Handel's oratorios, and it was very finely rendered in last week's performance. The principal soloists, Miss Marriott, Madame Patey, and Mr. E. Lloyd, gave, respectively, the music of Nitocris, Cyrus, and Belshazzar, with excellent effect; that of Gobrias having been well declaimed by Mr. Bridson. A very promising first appearance was made by Miss Chester (a pupil of Mr. W. H. Cummings). The young lady, who was heard for the first time at a great public concert, gave the solo music of Daniel in a way to elicit very general applause. With more experience, and the consequent gain of confidence, Miss Chester may prove a valuable addition to the list of oratorio singers. Mr. Charles Hallé conducted the performance with care and judgment, and Mr. Fountain Meen was an efficient organist. "Elijah" is to be given by the society on March 27.

Last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert was rendered partially commemorative of the bicentenary of the birth of Bach, having been somewhat in anticipation of the anniversary date thereof—March 21. The selection from his works opened with the overture belonging to the orchestral "Suite" in C, and included Herr Joachim's fine performance of the "Chaconne" in D minor for violin alone; the concerto in the same key for two violins, by the same executant and Herr R. Heckmann; an organ toccata and fugue ably rendered by Mr. A. J. Eyre—having closed with extracts from the sacred cantata "Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott," so entitled from the Lutheran chorale, which is introduced into the cantata, that fine old tune being the musical watchword of religious liberty in Germany. The tenor solos in this music were well sung by Mr. H. Kearton. The remainder of Saturday's concert consisted of Mendelssohn's violin concerto—played by Herr Joachim—and Brahms's Festival Overture on German Student songs.

The Monday Popular concert of this week included the only appearance here of Signor Bottesini, whose extraordinary performances on his unwieldy instrument have long since gained for him the appellation of "the Paganini of the double-bass." His reappearance in London, after a long interval, took place at a Philharmonic concert last year. On Monday he played, as finely as ever, in an andante and rondo of his own composition, and was greeted with an enthusiastic encore. Other features of the programme call for no comment.

The first of Herr Franke's three concerts of chamber music, introducing the Heckmann quartet party (from Cologne), took place at Prince's Hall on Thursday week, when the programme consisted of string quartets by Schumann (No. 3 of op. 41, in A), Beethoven (op. 95, in F minor), and Schubert (posthumous, in D minor). The members of the party—Herren R. Heckmann, O. Forberg, T. Allekotte, and R. Bellman—are, individually, highly skilled artists; and their performances collectively have a consentaneousness rarely heard, and such as can only result from special musical intelligence and indefatigable practice. Energy without exaggeration, and delicacy without feebleness are admirably realised; together with the clearness and decision of rhythm and accent that cannot be over estimated. The second performance was given last Tuesday evening, and the third is announced for next Tuesday evening.

Mdlle. Louise Douste (De Fortis) gave a recital at Prince's Hall last week, as already briefly stated. The young pianist manifested high skill and an individuality of style in her several performances of music by Schumann, Chopin, and other composers. There is a distinctiveness about her playing that should gain for her a special place among public artists. The recital included vocal pieces rendered by Miss Griswold, and the co-operation of Mr. Kornfeld (violin) and Mr. Whitehouse (violoncello).

The Paddington Choral Association gave a performance of "The Messiah" at Prince's Hall last Monday evening.

Mr. John Boosey's last London Ballad concert of the series took place, at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, when a programme of varied attractions was prepared.

Mr. Isidore de Lara and M. Henri Logé announced the first of two "Soirées Artistiques" to take place, at Prince's Hall, last Thursday evening, the second being fixed for next Tuesday evening.

Gounod's oratorio, "The Redemption," will be repeated by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society—conducted by Mr. Barnby—next Wednesday evening.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society give an orchestral concert next Monday evening in the Highbury Athenæum—the programme including Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Selections from Suite Dvorák and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Overtures—"Oberon," Weber, and "Hans Heiling," Marschner; Choral Motets; "Gloria," Hauptmann; "Pater Noster," Meyerbeer; &c.

Mr. Louis Milbourne's second American concert, under distinguished American patronage, will take place at the Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, next Monday evening, at which several American artists of note will assist.

Dr. Damrosch, whose death was recently reported from New York, had gained much distinction there as a musician, especially as an orchestral conductor. He organised the Oratorio Society, the Symphony Society, the May Festival, and German opera performances.

A correspondent of the Standard, writing from Buckhurst Hill, says that the nightingale was heard there on Friday night.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

A play full of dignity and noble purpose, the work of a scholar and a dramatist; a tragedy, sonorous enough to suit the supporters of the old stage, and yet sufficiently attractive to influence the patrons of the modern theatre; the kind of play that should be the ambition of an earnest manager to produce, the style of work that a critic appreciative of art would not carelessly reject; in a word, an entertainment worthy the approval of a cultured public:—such, I ventured to think, would have been the verdict solemnly pronounced on Lord Lytton's posthumous "Junius; or, The Household Gods." And yet, though it is the fashion to sneer at modern managers for their attention to trade, it is curious to notice what small credit they get for their earnestness in the cause of art. The irreverent playgoer is patted on the back by the cynical critic. The manager who dares to suggest imagination and poetry in connection with stage work is instantly compelled to run a gauntlet of chaff, and to stand a fire of insolent modern satire. When Lord Lytton sat down to write a tragedy on the subject chosen by Shakspeare for his "Rape of Lucrece," the dishonour of the fair and virtuous Lucretia at the hands of the base Sextus Tarquin, the tale of the suppression of sensuality by the free and honest clamour of liberal Rome, he little dreamed of the existence of a drama-loving people who could clamour so loudly for literature on the stage, and treat it with such scorn when it was suggested. That the appearance of an Oscan slave, dark-skinned and cat-footed, should immediately suggest the Mahdi; that the blazing hearth, by which Lucretia sits singing during her husband's absence, should be likened to a Christmas bowl of snapdragon; that the fall of the tutelary deities or household gods during a thunderstorm should be compared to the scattering of the pins at a game of skittles; that the appearance of the weird Sibyl out of the lonely rocks in the environs of old Rome should call up recollections of the hermit of Cremorne; or that "The Removal of the Household Goods" should be instantly suggested as the title for an instant burlesque, are circumstances that should cause no surprise. No one can stop the tongue of the so-called wag—the nuisance of the modern playhouse. But that which is surprising is that importance and currency should be given to such very cheap ribaldry. It seems to be the purpose of modern criticism to encourage irreverence, and to make the work of such men as Henry Irving and Wilson Barrett doubly difficult. There is little disposition, in considering a work of this kind, to view it, with all its faults, as infinitely superior to anything we have had for a considerable time in the way of dignity and purpose. Supposing the opening acts are dull, can it be denied that the succeeding scenes are as stirring as they are dramatic? Granted that the story is slight, can it be conscientiously stated that it is ever trivial? Assuming that the acting is unequal, was it in any instance found to be commonplace or vulgar? It seemed to me that the audience on the first night was conquered and convinced by the dramatic power of the play; that they hesitated at the outset, but warmed gradually as the fire of interest glowed; that they were disappointed at the exordium, but accepted the story from the time of Lucretia's dishonour as one of stirring strength, having for its conclusion a last act as fine and worthy as anyone would desire to find in tragedy. And yet these same people, with all their ill-defined ambition for better things, are to be told next day how foolish they were to accept electro-plate for solid silver. "How can such a subject be possibly good?" says one. "Why, Shakspeare would have used it for a play if it were worth anything, and as it was he only made a poem out of it! It stands to reason Lord Lytton was wrong." "What nonsense to believe the play can be a good one!" says another. "Why, it has been buried away and never produced since the days of Macready! It is not likely that any good wine could have been overlooked in the dramatic cellar; at any rate, we do not intend to commit ourselves to the tasting of Bulwerian port. We know far more about new champagne." A third, not content with ridiculing a play that must be bad because it is posthumous, actually implies that to think well of such a work is a proof of venality! The faith that would encourage such a play as "Junius" as a step in the right direction is regarded as a personal affront. It is not possible apparently to echo the praise and good feeling of a crowded house without loss of self-respect. We are gravely told that "when the echoes of inspired or sycophantic criticism have died away," then "Junius" will appear in its true light—mere rhetorical rubbish. Of "Claudian," its authors, designers, and promoters, it has been said, "Enter boldly here, for here, too, are gods!" These are the words that were to be inscribed on the porticoes of the Princess's Theatre a few months ago as aids and supports to the literary drama; but, in the case of Lord Lytton's play, praise far less enthusiastic can only be the work of inspired writers and sycophants! Honestly and seriously, is this the way to advance literature and order on the stage? May it not sometimes be granted that the only "motive" in writing, whether it be praise or blame, is a desire of saying what is conscientiously believed to be true and just?

Of the literature of Lord Lytton's play I am not prepared to be so dogmatic as many of those who have contemptuously snuffed it out. I cannot judge of the poetry of a play by a few extracts printed and sent round for quotation. They are probably those I should feel least inclined to allude to had I space at my command. Some day, perhaps, we shall see "The Household Gods" in print, and then it will be time to say whether it be poetry or pedantry. Both silly and sycophantic as it may appear, this is just one of those plays I should like to see again, not alone for its exquisite setting, not only for the pictures of old Rome and such scenes as have not been presented since Mr. Irving mounted the Poet Laureate's "Cup." I was impressed with the scene between Brutus and the Oscan slave on the eve of the rebellion to dethrone the Tarquins; with the weird incantation of the Sibyl that first strikes the keynote of the drama; with the scene between Lucretia and the treacherous Sextus in the still summer evening that precedes the fateful thunderstorm; with that fine and most impressive scene where Lucretia, clad in her mourning robes, wails forth her unutterable woe before her father, husband, and kinsmen, and falls dead with shame at their astonished feet. I was struck with the final passage of that stirring act when, led by Brutus, recovered to reason, the indignant people cry for vengeance on the Tarquins; and, lastly, I could see with pleasure many times the whole of the last act, in which the cowardly and cringing Sextus shaking on his throne is brought face to face with his dead victim, and pays the penalty of his atrocious crime. It is possible that some thousands of playgoers may incline to the same honest opinion, even before "the echoes of inspired or sycophantic criticism have died away"; and may consider the play not, indeed, as perfect, and occasionally as dull, but, on the whole, as a thing worthy to see and excellent to consider. Tragedies are not apt to go off so spick and span as modern melodramas. As we are sententiously told, "The writer of a blank-verse tragedy employs perforce a strange and stilted tongue." He does. Shakspeare suffered from that unfortunate complaint; but it is not yet considered "sycophantic" to admire Shakspeare.

It has been pointed out, no doubt with justice, that the probable reason that this play has remained so long on the shelf is that it contains two parts of almost equal importance. Human nature exists on the stage as well as elsewhere; and leading tragedians, as a rule, do not care to divide their glory. They certainly did not in the days of Macready. This circumstance did not, however, influence Mr. Wilson Barrett, who has selected the less showy part of Brutus, and has thereby materially increased the value of the success. No one on the stage could play Brutus or look it half so well as Mr. Barrett. On him the whole weight of the play falls. It is the axle on which the whole dramatic machinery revolves. An insignificant or uninteresting Brutus would have ruined the play. If the subject is to receive dignity and to command attention, the Junius Brutus must be a pleasant figure to look upon and with an agreeable voice to hear. The value of Mr. Barrett's physique, acting, and elocution is extremely great, and this fact will be generally recognised by all who have studied acting. The part of Sextus Tarquin is unquestionably a fine one, with great opportunities invaluable to a great actor. Mr. Willard cannot do all that might be done with Tarquin, but he makes no mistakes. He does not always rise to the occasion, but he is seldom insignificant. His last act is the best, though it contains no sign of absolute genius. It is a creditable, clever performance; it might be a grand one. Had a genius been here, probably Lord Lytton's play would have been lauded to the skies, for it is so difficult to discriminate between a tragedy finely and tamely performed in its most stirring scenes. Miss Eastlake, in the character of Lucretia, is seen at her best. She has shaken off the hysterical manner that prejudiced her earliest efforts, and may be highly commended for her acting in the scene descriptive of Lucretia's ruin. It was most artistic and effective. Mr. Hudson, Mr. Speakman, Mr. Evans, Mr. Fulton, and Mr. Clifford Cooper are all seen to advantage in the cast. The play is magnificently mounted, and it should be recommended as an honest and brave attempt to revive an interest in the poetical drama. It appeals to thoughtful men and educated minds, and should not be the less welcome on that account.

A notice of the revival of "Masks and Faces," produced at the Haymarket, is unavoidably deferred until next week. A new spectacular play, set in old Venice, and called "The Lady of the Locket," is to be produced at the Imperial Theatre on Thursday—too late for notice; and the promised melodrama by Mr. G. R. Sims, for the Adelphi, has been postponed until Easter Eve.

The Gazette announces the appointment of Sir James Fergusson, Bart., Governor of Bombay, to be an Extra Knight Grand Commander of the Star of India.

Mr. John Kenelm Digby Wingfield-Digby (Conservative), of Sherborne Castle, Dorsetshire, was on Tuesday returned unopposed for Mid-Somerset, in succession to Mr. Gore-Langton, who resigned.

The thirty-eighth festival of the Asylum for Idiots, Earlswood, was held at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate, on Tuesday evening—Sir Farrer Herschell, M.P., the Solicitor-General, in the chair. The subscriptions amounted to £1518.

There were 2709 births and 1569 deaths registered in London last week, the former having been 110 and the latter 219 below the average numbers in the corresponding weeks of the past ten years. The deaths included 18 from smallpox, 29 from measles, 16 from scarlet fever, 16 from diphtheria, and 45 from whooping cough.

The Lord Mayor has received over £2000 in aid of the Mansion House Fund for a National Memorial to General Gordon, which was only started on Wednesday week. Messrs M. N. Rothschild and Sons and Messrs. Baring Brothers have each given £500; J. R. A., £250; Mr. Walter Morrison, £100; Mr. R. Loder, M.P., £100; and Mr. Mackenzie, of Fawley Court, £10.

The London Society of Compositors has issued its thirty-seventh annual report, which shows that during the past year over £4000 was paid to unemployed members, nearly £1000 for superannuation, £1100 to representatives of deceased members, £150 to medical charities, and over £550 to men who had been discharged for adherence to trade society principles. Other and smaller items of expenditure represent such benefits as assisted emigration, removal grants, compensation for loss of tools in fires, and the free use of a library of 9000 volumes.

The Architectural and Building Trades Exhibition was opened at the Floral Hall, Covent-garden, on Monday, under the auspices of the Society of Architects. It is one of the most complete collections of specimens and appliances that has yet been brought together. There was a soirée given on Monday evening, which was well attended, the programme of entertainments including musical and theatrical performances and recitations. The exhibition continued open to the public during the remainder of the week, conferences being held daily in the afternoon.

Cunningham and Burton were again brought up at Bow-street, last Monday, on the charge of being concerned in causing the dynamite explosion in the Tower. Mr. Poland stated that the movements of both prisoners to and from America had been traced for several months back, and it had been proved that they were connected in this work. Evidence was given connecting them both with the explosion which took place at the Victoria Station, as well as that on the Metropolitan Railway. On Tuesday several Southampton witnesses were examined in support of the statement that the portmanteau containing dynamite found at Charing-cross Station was bought by Burton on his arrival from America.

It seems probable that the shilling pocket edition system has a prosperous future before it in this country. Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, and Co. have undertaken "The Waterside Series" in this form, to be edited by Redspinner. We have received the first number, in the shape of a neatly got up issue of Waterside Sketches, the editor's first angling book, which has been for some time out of print. Its popularity certainly warranted the republication. There is little doubt that the aspiration of the preface will be fully realised, and that readers "will appreciate the opportunity now given them of obtaining cheap and handy editions, that may be clapped into the pocket, to fill up odd half-hours, either by the fireside or on fishing excursions." Mr. Senior, however, has always striven, successfully, to interest other than angling readers, and to fill in the framework of sport with the delightful colouring of country life. "Waterside Sketches" is a companion volume to the recently published and successful "Amateur Angler's Days in Dovedale" (favourably noticed in our columns), which, it is an open secret, was written by Mr. Marston, long connected with the firm from which it emanated. "The Waterside Series," of which five numbers are already announced, should, and no doubt will, be a most welcome addition to our bookstall literature.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

"Rainbow Gold" continues to be the chief attraction of the Cornhill; yet, though an exceedingly clever story, the ability displayed is too purely literary. The personages, though in no respect unnatural, impress us rather as ingeniously contrived than as creations or transcripts from nature. The same inability to compel belief spoils "The Two Carnegies," a disagreeable tale enough, but which might otherwise have been powerful. It is not that the incidents themselves lack verisimilitude, but there is an absence of the force necessary for impressing a painful conception on the imagination. "Recollections of Buddhist Monasteries" are highly entertaining, and there is a paper of pleasant scientific chat about the artistic achievements of prehistoric man.

Loyal readers will be gratified with the pleasant, simple extracts from the diary of Prince Edward and Prince George's voyage in the Bacchante, given in the English Illustrated Magazine, with excellent woodcuts of Australian scenery interspersed. "A Family Affair" continues interesting, and has a powerful chapter on the proceedings of a liberated convict. There is a valuable paper on the art of casting in bronze, by a sculptor of practical experience; and Professor Minto contributes an amusing paper on pilgrimages, made up in a great measure from a very practical guide-book for the use of pilgrims printed by Caxton.

Blackwood is by no means brilliant this month, being mainly occupied with political articles, which may be sound, but are certainly dreary. The principal exceptions are the conclusion of "Plain Frances Mowbray," a good story; and the continuation of "The Waters of Hercules," one of the best specimens of the characteristically Blackwoodian novel.

We hardly know whether to account it a satisfactory symptom that the North American Review should be so largely indebted to English writers. The contributions of Archdeacon Farrar, Professor Max Müller, and Mr. G. J. Romanes are all valuable, and the interchange of thought between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race is an excellent thing in itself; but we should like a more pronounced national character in a journal once so distinctively American. The only remarkable article by an American writer is Mr. Murat Halstead's on Sectionalism at the South, the evil of which seems, somehow, to have become more visible than of yore—since the Republicans lost the Presidential election.

It is amusing enough to remark everybody's haste, when any great personality or great book appears, to appropriate the corner which happens to be congenial or significant to himself. Mr. Hutton, discussing George Eliot's biography in the Contemporary Review, can see nothing but the discomfort that befell George Eliot from her inability to agree with Mr. Hutton in theology; a discomfort, as Carlyle would have said, in nowise visible to us. Mr. F. Harrison, in the Fortnightly Review, does more justice to George Eliot's grave and chastened happiness in the future she discerned for mankind; but he, too, has omitted to swallow his formula, and plainly admires George Eliot as a great and noble woman, who came nearer than most to being a disciple of M. Comte. In truth, both Mr. Hutton's and Mr. Harrison's essays are tracts in disguise. The latter, however, has the merit of being the only generally readable article in the Fortnightly, for Mr. May's extremely valuable article on the Bank of England only addresses a special class; and the discussions on India, Imperialism, and the Land Laws, though frequently able, are dry. Sir Lepel Griffin may be right or wrong in his controversy with Mr. Wilfrid S. Blunt, but he does not add to the force of his arguments by bestowing such an obviously inappropriate designation as "An Indian Thersites" upon the latter.

The Contemporary, as a whole, is greatly superior to the Fortnightly this month. Sir Richard Temple's discussion of the probable effect of Mahdism on India will be read with great interest; and Mrs. Pfeiffer's plea for female suffrage is one of the most spirited papers called forth by that subject. Miss Leppington's analysis of Amiel's journal preserves much of the aroma of that delicate piece of spiritual introspection. Professor Dallinger's review of the recent progress of biology treats of some important discoveries—the oviparousness of the Platypus and its allies, and the occurrence of insects in strata of immense antiquity.

The National Review also shows improvement. The best among several good articles are M. Katscher's impartial sketch of the Salvation Army, Mr. Lethbridge's investigation of the possibility of a customs' union with the Colonies, and Mr. Blackburne Daniell's reasonable and weighty exposition of the mischief and unfairness of the Redistribution Bill, as it stands, in Ireland.

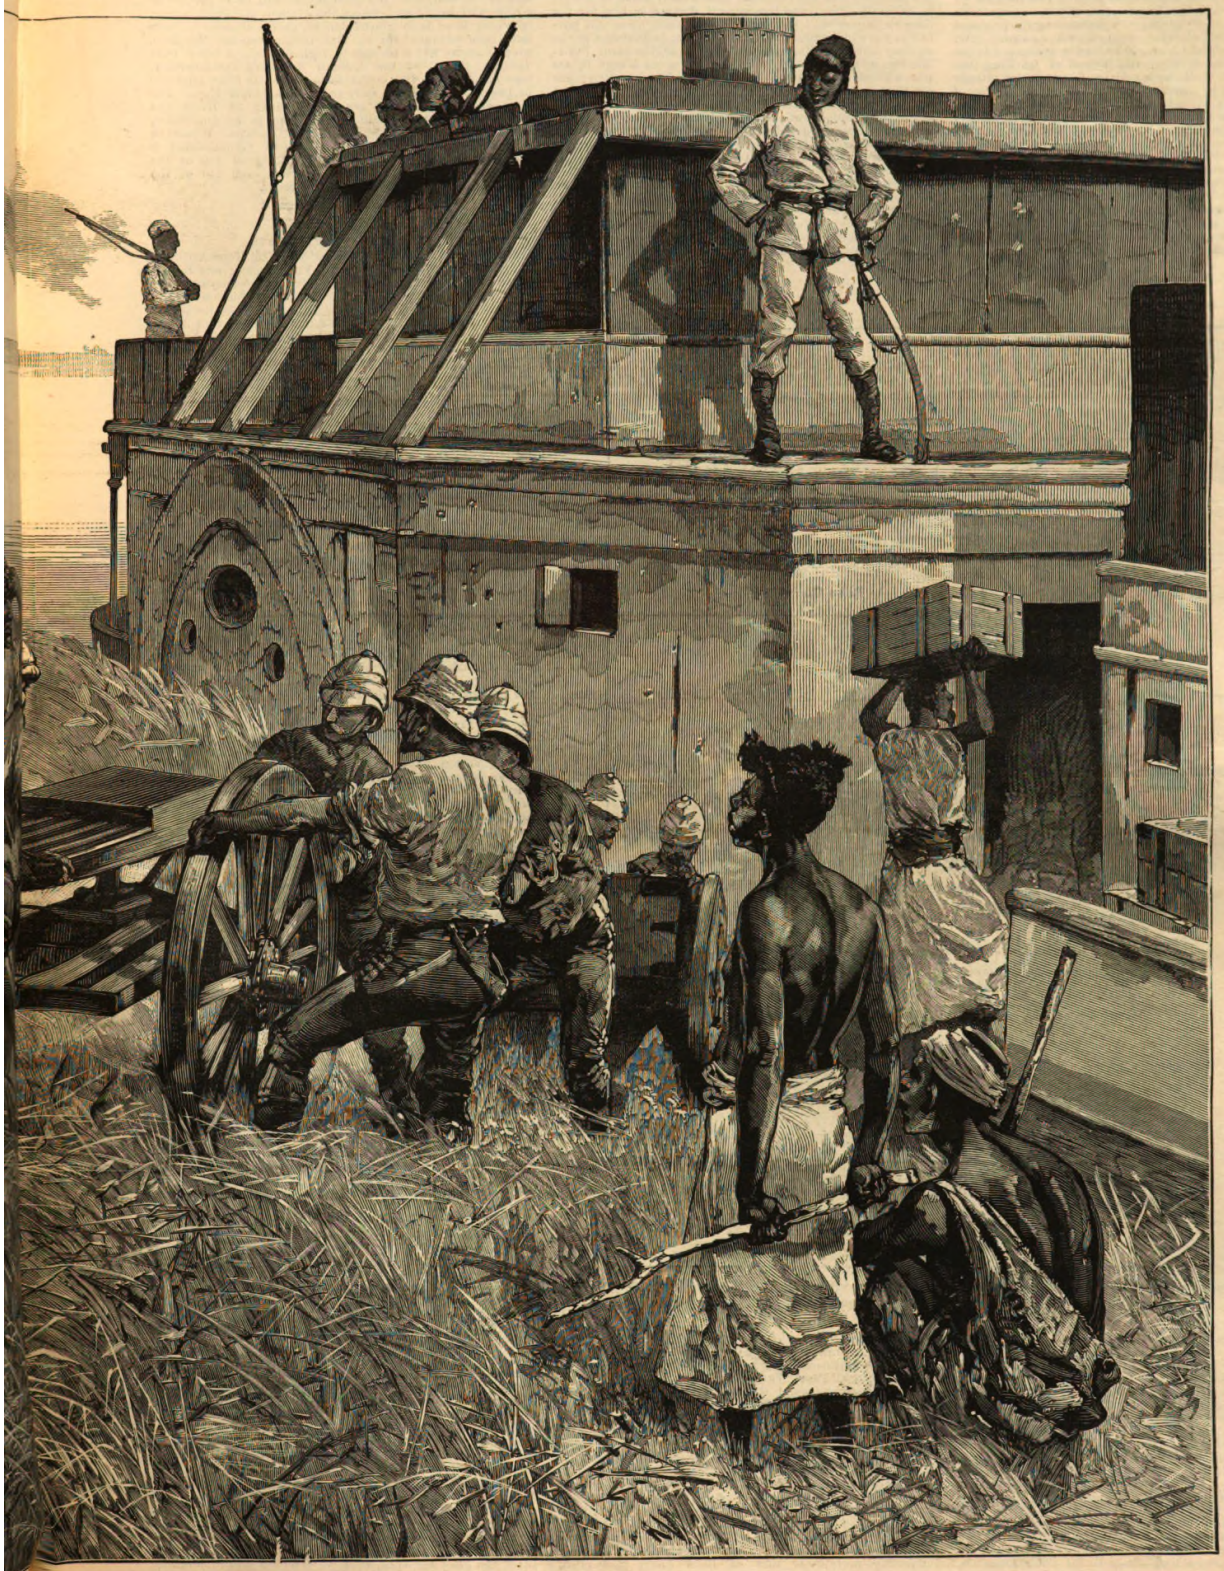
Harper, besides its always excellent stories, has illustrated papers on the House of Orange and on Washington City, displaying the great progress of domestic architecture in the United States, and a curious set of extracts from Jefferson's accounts, showing a singular combination of method and extravagance. In a striking paper on "Manifest Destiny," Professor Fiske contends that the economic competition of America must eventually render European armaments impossible, and pave the way for a universal federation of mankind.

A varied number of the Atlantic Monthly continues Mr. Craddock's excellent "Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains," and Miss O'Meara's recollections of Madame Mohl's salon. Other contributions of mark are the commencement of Oliver Wendell Holmes's "New Portfolio," Mr. Bishop's Mark Twain-like "Brown Stone Boy," and a sketch of Turgeneff's mother, a fearful and terrible old lady.

The Century, always in the vanguard with subjects arresting public interest, has a magnificently illustrated paper on the "Land of the False Prophet," which conveys a most vivid idea of the physical features of that rugged and savage region. The illustrations to Professor Langley's astronomical paper are equally fine, though some are borrowed from Nasmyth and Carpenter. There is also a striking portrait of Daniel Webster, and the usual wealth of illustration in the military reminiscences of the Civil War, the subjects this month being the duel of the Monitor and the Merrimac, and the first stage of McClellan's Peninsular campaign.

The Melbourne Review is always a welcome visitor, attesting the prevalence of earnest views combined with decided literary faculty in Australia. All the papers in the two numbers before us are suggestive, those on legal and ecclesiastical questions particularly so.

We have not space to do more than to commend to our readers the new numbers of the Art Journal, and the Magazine of Art, both of which are of unusual excellence.



Other magazines will be noticed next week.

At the Sandown Park Meeting last week the Grand Prize was carried off by Mr. J. H. Houldsworth's Master M'Grath, Mr. T. Cannon's Dethroned being second. Mr. T. Cannon's Nosegay won the Metropolitan Hunters' Flat Race, Mr. H. Hungerford's Freney took the St. James's Stakes, and the Duke of Hamilton's Terrier won the Wolsey Handicap.

AN ESCORT OF THE SUSSEX REGIMENT, EMBARKING AT GUBAT, TO GO UP THE NILE.

THE AFGHAN FRONTIER INVADED BY RUSSIA.

On Tuesday, in both Houses of Parliament, Ministerial statements of the gravest importance were made concerning the sudden encroachments of the Russian military forces within the territory of Afghanistan immediately north of Herat. This act is the more unjustifiable, taking place as it does in the presence of the British Commissioner, General Sir Peter Lumsden, who has been kept waiting above two months for the expected arrival of the Russian Commissioner to perform the appointed task of surveying and delineating the proposed boundary, which would have been drawn eastward from Sarakhs to the Murghab river, to be thence continued to the Oxus. The Russian Government, instead of fulfilling that engagement, has sent M. Lessar to London to prefer entirely new claims, upon very frivolous grounds, to a large portion of the Badghis country, lying between the two rivers Heri-rud and Murghab, including the strategic routes of approach to the city of Herat; and it has now, without any apparent warrant, permitted its military authorities on the border of Turkestan to thrust forward their outposts forty or fifty miles southward, seizing the Zulfagar Pass, on the Heri-rud above Pul-i-Khatun (which the Russians occupied several months ago), with the line eastward through Ak-robat to the Kushk river, thence down that stream to Pul-i-Khisti, and to the Murghab above Penjdeh. These places, with Ak Tapa, at present held by an Afghan garrison, and with Sari-yazi, lower down the Murghab, would thus be appropriated by the Russian Empire.

Ak Tapa, which appears in this Number, with those of several of the leading native inhabitants of Penjdeh, who belong to the Sarok Turkoman race, but are unquestionably subjects of the Ameer of Afghanistan.

With reference to the particular Sketches given this week, some of them were taken at Penjdeh, on the Murghab, which is the river flowing northward from the mountains of Afghanistan over the steppe, the habitation of the Tekke Turkomans, recently made Russian subjects, to Merv. The country between the Murghab and the Heri-rud, immediately north of Herat, is called Badghis; and the present dispute is how far the Russian Empire shall be allowed to encroach upon this particular piece of territory, which is of great importance to the military defence of Herat and of Western Afghanistan. Pul-i-Khatun, on the Heri-rud, and Penjdeh, on the Murghab, are places which Russia has apparently no right to occupy; but the Russian pretensions extend still farther, under the pretext that the Salor Turkomans, who are now reckoned to belong to the Russian protectorate, have a customary pasturage for their cattle in the well-watered plains of Badghis. On the eastern side of that country the Murghab is joined, near Ak Tapa, by another river, the Kushk; and some of our Artist's Sketches are views of the Kushk Valley, and of the confluence of these two rivers, close to the Afghan fort at Ak Tapa. Kona Penjdeh, or "Old Penjdeh," as it is locally styled, is not, so far as Mr. Simpson could ascertain, a place thus called to distinguish it from a "New Penjdeh"; but the prefix to its name seems rather to denote its positive antiquity, as there are signs of an ancient town having formerly existed there. It consists at

MAP SHOWING THE DISPUTED FRONTIER BETWEEN RUSSIAN TURKESTAN AND AFGHANISTAN.
(The Zulfagar Pass, Ak-robat, Pul-i-Khisti, and Sari-yazi have just been seized by the Russians.)

Our Special Artist, Mr. William Simpson, who accompanied Sir Peter Lumsden and his staff from England, travelling through Persia and Khorassan, has been in the country now in dispute since the first week of November; and we are thus enabled, at this critical moment, to present accurate views, from his Sketches, of many of the places in the Badghis territory, which had seldom previously been visited by European travellers who could furnish an exact description of them. A portion of the Sketches already in hand, comprising those of Pul-i-Khisti, on the Kushk river, six miles from Penjdeh; Ak Tapa, at the junction of the Kushk and Murghab rivers; Kala-i-Maur and Kara Tapa, on the Kushk, and Kona Penjdeh, are given in this week's Number of our Journal. We reserve for next week several Views of Old and New Sarakhs, of Pul-i-Khatun, and of other places on the Heri-rud, with a Sketch Map of the Heri-rud Valley from Pul-i-Khatun up to the Zulfagar Pass, drawn by Captain A. F. Barrow, aide-de-camp to Sir Peter Lumsden, and communicated by him to our Special Artist. Portraits of the Russian Generals Komaroff and Alikhanoff, the first Governor of the Trans-Caspian Provinces, the latter Governor of Merv, are in our possession, as well as that of the Afghan General Ghous-ud-din Khan, commanding the frontier garrison at present of a small collection of huts or "kibitkas," the tents of the Sarok Turkoman people, on the Murghab, about six miles to the north-east of Pul-i-Khisti, and nearly the same distance from Ak Tapa. The position of Ak Tapa is really more important, as it commands the two rivers of Eastern Badghis, and the direct approach to Herat up the Kushk valley, which is evident from a glance at the Map. "Ak Tapa," in the Turkoman language means "The White Mound." There is a very large artificial mound here, 300 yards long, 150 yards wide, and 100 ft. high, formed of the lightish grey soil of the place. It may have been the site of an ancient temple; but the Afghans have converted it into a fort, erecting an earthen parapet around it, with a few embrasures for artillery. The Afghan commander is General Ghous-ud-din, a native of the tribe of Baruki, in the Logur valley, not far from Cabul. Our Artist has drawn the portrait of this officer, who is "comparatively young, and seems an active and able man." Another interesting portrait is that of Baba Karir, a Dervish, who is partly deaf and partly dumb; he comes from Balkh, but is a Sarok Turkoman, and now lives at Penjdeh. He was once a slave, and killed a man, for which he had his right hand cut off; yet he still carries a musket and several pistols and daggers, and wears round his neck a piece of the rope he was once bound with. The Sarok or Sarik Turkomans formerly occupied Merv, but were driven south by the Tekke Turkomans, who have lately been subdued by Russia. Mr. Simpson regards the Sarok as a mixed race, between the Persian and Mongolian types.

The recent news, telegraphed on the 23rd inst., is that Sir Peter Lumsden has now quitted Bala Murghab for a point nearer to Herat—namely, Galran or Girlin, forty miles east of the Heri-rud and between the two rivers, in the disputed territory of Badghis. His present care will be to prevent an outbreak of hostilities between the Afghans and the Russians, of which there is imminent danger, as the Russian outposts have been advanced on the Heri-rud, and on the Murghab, over a country which belongs to Afghanistan. A report from Teheran says that the Russian Boundary Commissioner, General Zelenoy, who ought to have met Sir Peter Lumsden in December, is not to start from Tiflis before May. The most alarming rumours are current both at Herat and in India. We would fain believe them to be unfounded, but there is great cause for serious apprehensions. It must be remembered, however, that the British Commissioner is supported by a military force, consisting of 200 of the 11th Bengal Lancers, under Major Bax, and 250 of the Punjaub Native Infantry, with other troops.

THE COURT.

At Windsor Castle, on the 25th ult., her Majesty's granddaughter, Princess Louis of Battenberg, eldest daughter of the Grand Duke of Hesse and the late Princess Alice, gave birth to a daughter. The Queen was present with the Princess during the greater part of the time. Both mother and child are doing as well as possible. The Queen went yesterday week to the Albert Chapel with Princess Beatrice and the Duchess of Albany, when her Majesty viewed the cast of the recumbent statue of Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, by Boehm, with which her Majesty and the Duchess of Albany expressed their entire satisfaction. Mr. Francis C. Ford, C.B., C.M.G., her Majesty's Minister at Madrid, was introduced to an audience of the Queen, and kissed hands on his appointment. The Princesses Victoria and Louise of Schleswig-Holstein visited her Majesty, and remained to luncheon. The Queen drove out in the afternoon, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and the Duchess of Albany. Lady Wolseley had the honour of dining with her Majesty. Lieutenant-Colonel C. W. Guinness, 2nd Battalion Seaforth Highlanders, who arrived at the castle in the evening, had the honour of being invited. The Queen went out last Saturday morning with Princess Beatrice and the Duchess of Albany. The Queen and Princess Beatrice drove to St. Bruno in the afternoon, and visited Count and Countess Gleichen. The Duchess of Albany and Princess Alice, and the infant Duke of Albany, left the castle for Claremont in the afternoon. Colonel Sir Howard and Lady Elphinstone arrived at the castle in the evening, and had the honour of dining with the Queen. On Sunday morning her Majesty, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Louis of Battenberg, and the members of the Royal household, attended Divine service in the private chapel. The Very Rev. Randall Davidson, Dean of Windsor, assisted by the Rev. J. St. John Blunt, M.A., Master of St. Katharine's Hospital, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, officiated. The Rev. St. John Blunt preached the sermon. Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne) and the Marquis of Lorne, K.T., arrived at the castle in the afternoon from London. The Hon. Lady Biddulph had the honour of dining with the Queen and the Royal family. On Monday morning her Majesty went out, attended by Lady Southampton. Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne) walked out, attended by Mdlle. Norèle. The Marquis of Lorne and Lord Reay, Governor of Bombay, who have been visiting the Queen, left Windsor Castle for London on Tuesday morning. Lord Methuen also quitted the castle. The Queen has directed Mr. Boehm to execute a bust of General Gordon, which will be placed in the corridor at Windsor Castle.

By command of the Queen, a Levée was held on Monday afternoon at St. James's Palace, by the Prince of Wales, on behalf of her Majesty. Prince Albert Victor of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge accompanied the Prince. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar was present. The presentations numbered about one hundred and sixty.

We are authorised to state that the Queen's physicians have advised her Majesty to avoid the fatigue of appearing at the first Drawingroom, which is to be held on Thursday, the 12th inst. The Princess of Wales will act for the Queen.

The Prince of Wales was present yesterday week at a meeting of the Royal Commission on the Dwelling Places of the Working Classes, at 8, Richmond-terrace. His Royal Highness went to the House of Lords in the afternoon. The Prince and Princess of Wales visited the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, to inspect M. Michael Munkacsy's picture of "Calvary." Last Saturday morning the Prince of Wales was present at a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Trustees of the British Museum, at the Natural History Museum, Cromwell-road. The Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince George, and by Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, were present in the afternoon at an amateur performance in aid of the funds for the restoration of Wolferton church, near Sandringham. On Sunday morning the Prince and Princess, with Prince George and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales, attended at the Temple Church, where the Archbishop of Canterbury preached a sermon in commemoration of the 700th anniversary of the consecration of the Round Church by Heraclius, Patriarch of Jerusalem. The Prince and Princess of Wales entertained at dinner at Marlborough House the Marquis and Marchioness of Ripon, the Earl and Countess of Rosebery, Lord Alcester, Musurus Pasha, Hassan Fehmy Pasha, Admiral Hobart, the Hon. Mr. Hobart-Hampden, and others. On Monday the Prince inspected the new building of the Stock Exchange, and received a cordial welcome from members of the House, who, for this occasion only, sang the National Anthem and "God Bless the Prince of Wales," accompanied by their Stock Exchange Orchestral Society. In honour of the Royal visit, business was practically suspended in the morning, and in the afternoon, out of respect to Royalty, Consols slightly rose. The Prince, attended by his Equerry-in-Waiting, honoured Lord Carrington and the Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms with his company at dinner in their mess-room at St. James's Palace. The Prince was present at the sitting of the House of Lords in the evening, and remained during the discussion relating to the reserves and the embodiment of the militia. In the course of their approaching Irish tour, the Prince and Princess will be the guests of Lord and Lady Kenmare at Killarney for two days. Mr. Christopher Sykes, M.P., has received a letter from Mr. F. Knollys stating that, in consequence of their numerous engagements, the Prince and Princess will not be able to visit Hull, as was hoped, for the opening of the Alexandra Dock, in connection with the Hull and Barnsley Railway, in June or July. On Tuesday the Prince and Princess went to Windsor on a visit to the Queen. The Prince gave a sitting to Mr. James Linton for his picture, "The Marriage of the Duke of Albany," painted by command of her Majesty. It is understood that the departure of the Prince and Princess for Ireland is fixed for the second week in April. The Princess has consented, at the request of the Art Gallery Committee of the Corporation of Manchester, to the painting of her portrait by Mr. Millais for the Free Permanent Gallery of the city of Manchester. Prince Albert Victor was last Saturday afternoon elected president of the Cambridgeshire Rifle Association for the present year. While the Empress Eugénie was driving in the neighbourhood of Farnborough on Monday, the horses bolted, and after galloping some distance one of them was killed by running against the shaft of a cart. She escaped with a severe shaking. The Queen not only sent a telegram of sympathy to the Empress, but dispatched one of her Equerries-in-Waiting to the Empress's residence at Farnborough Park to convey personally the Queen's deepest sympathies. Telegrams were also received from other members of the Royal family, and also from a large number of distinguished persons in England and from various parts of the Continent.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGE.

The marriage of Major George L. Wickham, Royal Horse Guards, of Park Hill, Wetheroy, York, and the Lady Elena Gordon, fifth daughter of Charles, tenth Marquis of Huntly, and sister of the present Peer, took place at St. Mark's Church, North Audley-street, last Saturday. A detachment of twenty-four non-commissioned officers and troopers of the Royal Horse Guards took places on each side of the chancel. The bridegroom was accompanied by Captain Evelyn G. H. Atherley, Royal Horse Guards, as best man. The bridesmaids—all children—were Miss Beatrice and Miss Armyne Gordon, nieces of the bride; and the Misses Wickham, twin nieces of the bridegroom. The bride came with the Dowager Marchioness of Huntly, her mother; and was conducted by the Marquis of Huntly to the altar, and he subsequently gave her away. The service was choral.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, March 3.

Sunday is a busy day for the Parisian revolutionaries. While the old-fashioned and hard-working Parisians take advantage of the Sunday holiday to take a walk with their wives and families in the Bois de Boulogne or the park of Vincennes, the modern agitators weary themselves and their audience by furious rhetorical protestations against the existing state of society in which they have the misfortune to live. In a dozen meetings, held in different parts of Paris last Sunday, the middle classes, the bourgeois, were threatened with butchery at the next revolution; while at Levallois-Perret the red Internationalist flag was hoisted side by side with the tricolour, and led to a terrible scandal. The occasion was the burial of two soldiers killed in Tonquin. For some reason or another, various Socialist and Atheist and Free-thinking societies attended the funerals, carrying the banners. M. Paul Déroulède also attended, accompanied by a number of members of the Ligue des Patriotes; and these latter came to blows with the Socialists, and attempted in vain to suppress their red flags, which they justly regarded as anti-French and anti-patriotic emblems, and therefore particularly out of place at the funeral of the two soldiers who had died for the glory of their country. The disgraceful scenes which followed reminded one of the incidents provoked by the Socialist and Internationalist emblems at the recent funeral of Jules Vallès. Certainly, the Socialists do exhibit the red flag as an anti-patriotic emblem; and one of their journals, Le Cri du Peuple, records with satisfaction that at the manifestation on Sunday the cries of "Vive le drapeau rouge!" drowned those of "Vive la patrie!" The alliance of the French Socialists with foreign Socialists, and the formation of a militant Internationalist party, "Les Sans-Patrie," is a new feature in French political evolution.

The meeting of the Dynamite Directory, mentioned in this place last week, has been called into question both here and in England, and treated as a myth. Figaro maintains the authenticity of its report, and publishes an interview with Michael Flannery, who announces that in two or three weeks Sir Vernon Harcourt will be convinced that the Dynamite Directory means something. Two Englishmen were present at this meeting. One of them, Knubley, who is now in prison for having attempted to assault a reporter of La France, used to be a proof-reader on one of the English papers published in Paris. Amongst the Parisian typographers there are a number of English, Irish, and German Socialists, Fenians, and revolutionaries of all kinds, who are in relations with the organisers of disorder on both sides of the Atlantic.

The Chamber of Deputies is still engaged in discussing the interminable Cereals Bill, and the Senate is busy with the Budget of 1885, so that there is no striking event to be recorded in the past Parliamentary week.

Picture exhibitions abound in Paris at the present moment. One of the most interesting is that of the drawings, water-colours, and engravings of the late Gustave Doré, now open in the rooms of the Cercle de la Librairie. The Bible, Dante, Ariosto, Shakspeare, Rabelais, Cervantes, all occupied Doré's marvellous imagination; and in presence of the two hundred chosen drawings here exhibited one remains fixed in astonishment at the infinite diversity of the subjects treated. On the other hand, one remarks the sameness of the artist's method of observation and rendering, and his curious disdain of reality. Doré was a fantastic dreamer, whose talent was never developed to the same degree as his genius. As a French critic has very well said, Doré "was a man of genius who had not the leisure to study and who spent his whole life in conceiving." This apothecosis of Doré at the Cercle de la Librairie will prepare the public for the sale of the contents of Doré's studio, which will be held at the Hôtel Drouot at the end of this month.

The Opéra celebrated Victor Hugo's eighty-third birthday by producing "Rigoletto," with Mesdames Kraus and Richard and MM. Lassalle and Dereime in the leading rôles. The revival is a decided success. But is it not strange that, after having been played for twenty-eight years in Italian, at the Théâtre Lyrique and the Italian Opéra, "Rigoletto" should finally reach the stage of the Grand Opéra in no better form than a French translation of an Italian libretto which is itself an adaptation and a slaughtering of Victor Hugo's great drama, "Le Roi s'Amuse"?

M. Jules Claretie, most inexhaustible of contemporary polygraphs, has dramatised his successful novel, "Le Prince Zilah." The piece, in four acts and a prologue, was produced at the Gymnase on Saturday with considerable success, thanks to the many moving and almost sensational scenes which the work contains. Indeed, M. Claretie's friends are already predicting that "Le Prince Zilah" will be as great a success as "Le Maître de Forges." The acting is excellent; and Madame Jane Hading, in particular, seems to be creating for herself a place beside Desclée and Sarah Bernhardt.

Zola's new novel, "Germinal," has just been published. It is a very stout volume, very difficult to read, and profoundly saddening and disgusting. The subject is a study of the miners and their life in the north of France—a social study rather than a novel—a colossal cartoon representing the gross, material life of the miners. M. Zola seems to be beset by sensual hallucinations, and his picture of the miners' life is that of a Kermesse of the flesh, violent, brutal, insatiable. The conclusion of M. Zola is that the miners are victims of a social injustice against which they struggle in vain, according to the Darwinian law by which the weak are at the mercy of the strong. The author of "Germinal," with all his artistic impassibility, thus takes sides with the Anarchists, who believe that social and economical problems can only be solved by bloodshed and fire.—M. Berthelot, of the Institute, has just published a profoundly interesting work on "Les Origines de l'Alchimie" (1 vol., Steinheil), in which he shows the connection of the alchemists with the early Christians, the Gnostics, and the Neoplatonists; while he publishes, for the first time, from Byzantine Greek manuscripts, a complete Corpus of Greek chemical treatises, and shows how modern chemists are tending to return to the old Greek theory of the unity of matter, on which was based the alchemists' doctrine of the transmutation of metals. M. Berthelot's book is most interesting, even to the uninitiated in the science of chemistry.—M. Clermont-Ganneau has published a curious account of the Shapira forgeries, and the incidents connected with their discovery, in a long pamphlet called "Les Fraudes Archéologiques en Palestine."

A large numbers of Anarchists have been arrested in various towns in the canton of Berne. Their plot, which was revealed by one of the conspirators, was to set fire to the Lorraine quarter of the city of Berne and then to carry out their designs against the Federal Palace.

In the German Parliament on Monday the debate took place on the credits asked for by the Government for the Cameroons district. Prince Bismarck said the attitude of the House hitherto could only strengthen the opposition offered by foreign Governments to a German colonial policy. It was certain, he added, that the English correspondence on the subject had assumed a sharper tone since the previous debates in the Reichstag. Confidential statements had been reproduced in official documents, and this showed that England was seriously out of temper with Germany. Prince Bismarck denied that he had ever given advice to this country respecting Egypt. When asked his opinion, he said that were he an English Minister he would seek the intervention of the Sultan in order to gain influence in Egypt, but would not annex that country, so as to avoid arousing the rivalry of France. In conclusion, he said that had his views been acted upon, England would perhaps now be in a better position.

Sir Leonard Tilley, Finance Minister in Canada, made a statement to Parliament on Tuesday night, giving amended estimates of the income and expenditure for the current fiscal year, showing a reduction of Customs' revenue of 500,000 dols., the result of reduced values of goods imported; and of 100,000 dols. reduction on spirits, caused by the adoption of the Permissive or Scott Act. The expenditure, over former estimates, on Indians, subsidies to provinces, and interest, the latter the result of the rapid construction of the Pacific Railway, would reduce the surplus to less than a quarter of a million dollars. The estimated revenue for next year is 33,000,000 dols., and the expenditure 31,750,000 dols.

On Tuesday the New South Wales contingent for the Soudan embarked at Sydney on board the Iberian and Australasian transports. Previous to their shipment, which took place in the presence of an enthusiastic multitude, some 50,000 in number, Governor Lord Augustus Loftus addressed them in stirring terms, and bade them godspeed.

THE SHADOW OF A CRIME. By HALL CAINE
Mr. Caine has written a fine story. Ralph Ray is a strong and a beautiful figure. The style is picturesque, and unusually full of incidents of a striking and novel kind. It is, moreover, full of that true local colour which you can only come from local knowledge. UNITED TELEPHONE COMPANY, LIMITED.
Oxford court, Cannon-street, London, E.C.,
March 2, 1885.
With a view of affording greater facilities to the Company's Subscribers, and of increasing the usefulness of the Exchange system throughout the Metropolis, the Directors of the UNITED TELEPHONE COMPANY, LIMITED, have the pleasure to announce that the London Exchanges are now open from Nine a.m. to Nine p.m., instead of from Nine a.m. to Seven p.m., as hitherto.
During the Session of Parliament, and until further notice, the West-End Exchanges are open all night—that is, there is a continuous service at the West-End Exchanges by day and by night.
The Directors have further arranged to connect the Exchanges with the Central Telegraph Office in St. Martin's-le-Grand, and all Subscribers to the Company's system will be able, from their own offices, to transmit and receive Telegrams direct through St. Martin's-le-Grand on arranging for payment of the ordinary tariff charged by the Post Office for the transmission of Inland and Foreign Messages. This service will be opened in the beginning of next month, and the UNITED TELEPHONE COMPANY will not make any extra charge for the increased facility thus afforded by the Telephone.
During the last few months the Company has been busily engaged remodelling its Exchanges, adapting them for the increasing number of their subscribers, and fitting them up with the best and most improved switching and ringing appliances. The additions and alterations, rendered imperative by the development of the Company's system, have had to be carried on during working hours, and may occasionally have caused temporary inconvenience to subscribers, but when these additions and alterations are completed, the service throughout London will be materially improved and accelerated.
By order of the Board,
THOS. BLAIKIE, Secretary.

CRÊPE IMPÉRIAL, for Mourning Wear.
It is all wool, and yet looks exactly like crêpe, as it has the crinkled or crimped surface which is inseparable from that fabric. It is solid and most durable, being free from the elasticity of the more perishable silk crêpe, which it so closely resembles, and yet it is glossy. It is made up effectively into costumes for deep mourning, when it is not compulsory to trim with crêpe, and will wear as long as the wearer elects to use it.—Extract from "The Queen, the Lady's Newspaper."

CHAPTER XVI.

THE ANGLO-SAXON.

The thirty or forty eligible residences which have received the name of Alexandra-gardens are to be found in an outlying quarter of the district now known as South Kensington, vice Brompton superseded. They stand upon a spot where there were actual gardens—cabbage-gardens—not so very long ago; but all trace of these has disappeared, and the word, as applied to this special row of buildings, has no more justification than that of custom and precedent. Viewed as dwellings, they probably lack something in soundness of structure; but to set against this, you have—as Adrian's landlord was at some pains to point out to him—the great advantage of originality of design, each house possessing its own distinctive character; so that, however odd might be the shape of your drawing-room, you could count with tolerable certainty upon that of your neighbour's drawing-room being odder still. No. 12 was fairly commodious, and the disposition of the rooms was certainly clever. There was an appearance of space about the hall; the staircase was broad and not too steep; the drawing-room and library had recesses in unexpected places, and the whole house was well adapted for those arrangements in stained glass and lincrusta, and wall-paper resembling stamped leather, whereby the modern Londoner strives to render existence beautiful. The rent demanded was a trifle high, to be sure, considering the remoteness of the situation; but upon this point Vidal quoted a dictum of the late Baron von Bunsen to the effect that a man should always house himself more expensively and live more simply than his means warrant; adding, as a result of his own observations, that people won't come to see you if you live at Notting-hill, whereas they will cheerfully drive double the distance for the same purpose if only your address ends with the letters S.W.

That it was desirable to have many visitors he took for granted; and Clare, who, for her part, would have been perfectly satisfied to see nobody but her husband from week's end to week's end, fell in with his views, and welcomed the visitors when they presented themselves, as they very soon did, in large numbers. She was proud of her husband's popularity; it was pleasant to her to receive the ladies who had known him in his bachelor days; to listen to the flattering things that they said about him; and to show them her pretty house. If there were difficulties in the way of effecting that retrenchment in house-keeping which was to balance the excess of rent, she kept them to herself. From the outset, she resolved that Adrian should not be troubled with such petty cares; and she fought single-handed the battle that most young wives have to fight. Happily, she was not altogether a novice. Her mother's frequent absences and occupations had caused a large share of the management of the Cardrew household to fall upon her shoulders, and she knew pretty well what was required for the smaller establishment over which she now reigned. What she did not know, and had to learn by painful experience, was the discrepancy that exists between Cornish and London prices. She had troubles with the milkman and troubles with the cook, and perhaps a few tears may have fallen upon the weekly bills, which somehow always exceeded the sum agreed upon by her and her husband as sufficient. She paid her way—not, however, without the sacrifice of some of her pin-money—and maintained a lighthearted demeanour; yet, little as she would have acknowledged it, even to herself, the bloom of her youth was rubbed off by this daily struggle, and married life began to reveal itself to her as something different from the life of her dreams.

It is a curious fact that men do not, as a rule, shrink from subjecting their wives to the trials which are inseparable from poverty; although very few of us would care to see our daughters exposed to what, after all, is a sort of degradation. Adrian handed over his weekly cheque and asked no questions. To do him justice, if Clare had requested more, he would have given her more without grumbling, though he could not very well have afforded it; but since she did not ask, he let well alone. Moreover, he, too, had his daily share of work to get through. That it happened to be a pleasanter kind of work than hers was not his fault.

Early in the year his second novel saw the light, and for a few weeks after the appearance of the book there was a pause of anxious expectation in Alexandra-gardens. The author, after vacillating some time between hope and fear, was inclined towards despondency: on the other hand, the author's wife, who had seen the proof sheets, was so confident as to the favourable reception which the public would accord to "Two Lovers" that it was difficult to help being infected by her enthusiasm.

"It is by far the most interesting novel I ever read," she declared, with pardonable exaggeration; "there isn't a page in it that I should wish altered. And it is you all through, Adrian. I didn't recognise you in 'Satiety'; it seemed to me that you were not writing what you thought so much as what worldly people profess to think. But in 'Two Lovers' you are yourself. I don't know whether the critics will praise it or not; but I do know that everyone who cares for a charming story will read it and delight in it."

"They won't discover that it's charming unless the critics tell them so," answered Vidal. "I don't know why anyone should think it charming. There's nothing in it that I can see."

As a matter of fact, there was rather more in it than he supposed. It was not a work of the highest genius; but it was an excellent story, very well told, and it had just that happy combination of romance with realism which is so sure to please and so hard to accomplish. Vidal had conceived his novel under conditions especially favourable to this kind of composition. The greater part of it had been written at a time when he was profoundly and, as he believed, hopelessly in love; his pen had faithfully recorded his own feelings; the situations and incidents that he described were many of them such as he himself had had experience of; half unconsciously, he had made the chief character a copy of Clare Irvine—not the real Clare, but an idealised version of her which she herself would never have recognised. This imaginary personage was destined to become one of the most popular heroines of modern fiction, and in many an English household her name is still remembered and coupled with the creations of authors to whose celebrity Adrian Vidal has never attained. The book had been completed with more ease and rapidity than his previous one; and this, among other things, caused him to think slightingly of it. It is proverbial that an artist is no judge of his own works. He can hardly avoid estimating their value by the amount of pains that he has taken to produce them, whereas the purchaser has quite another standard.

From the purchaser's point of view, "Two Lovers" was almost as satisfactory as Clare had pronounced it to be; and Vidal was not kept long in suspense before this encouraging verdict was made known to him. One afternoon he came in, holding in his hand a copy of his old enemy, the Monday Review, which he tossed down upon the work-table beside which his wife was seated. From the subdued radiance of his countenance, Clare perceived, before she looked at the paper, that all was well; but she was scarcely prepared for the unstinted praise which presently met her eye.

The reviewer began by saying that he had opened "Two Lovers" with grave apprehensions. The lovers to whom recent writers of fiction had introduced him had not been pleasant people to meet, and he had felt no desire to become acquainted with two more of them. But this distrustful attitude had soon been abandoned.

"After we had reached the end of the first chapter, our critical faculties fell into abeyance; we surrendered ourselves unreservedly to the charm of this most delightful novel, and read it from beginning to end without marking a single passage for praise or blame. We hardly like to think how many years it is since we have been able to say as much of any novel that has fallen into our hands. . . . 'Two Lovers' is a book to be enjoyed, not to be criticised. It is throughout so healthy in tone, so spontaneous, and so true to nature, that a man feels himself growing young again as he reads, and has not the heart to cavil at details or to point out to the author in what respects his story is capable of improvement. . . . We are heartily glad to see that Mr. Vidal can produce something better than the stale and dreary moralising which he inflicted upon us in 'Satiety.' He may rest assured that the less he gives us of that kind of writing in future, and the more of such novels as 'Two Lovers,' the better it will be alike for his readers and his reputation."

Now, this was certainly very handsome; and though Vidal might affect to make light of it, and say that it was always a mere toss-up whether you got kicks or halfpence from that quarter, he could not altogether conceal his satisfaction nor refrain from remarking by-and-by: "After all, the old Monday is about the best paper that deigns to criticise us poor novel-writers with anything like fulness. The men who write for it express themselves like gentlemen and men of the world; there's no denying that. I don't think they are always quite fair, you know; but"——

"Well, they have been fair this time, at all events," interrupted Clare, decisively; and Adrian did not feel called upon to contradict her.

The Monday Review happened to be the first to notice "Two Lovers"; but other journals speedily followed suit, and were no whit less flattering in their observations. One and all, big guns and little guns, pronounced unequivocally in favour of the book; there was not a single discordant note in the whole chorus of approval. What was perhaps of more importance, was that the good opinion of the press was fully confirmed by the public. Within a few weeks of its appearance, the first edition of "Two Lovers" was exhausted; and a second and a third went off with equal rapidity, and Vidal's publishers, smiling graciously upon him, assured him that the sale of the work showed no signs of diminishing. In these days of circulating libraries such triumphs are not common, and a comparatively unknown writer who is thus distinguished may be pretty sure of having the whole publishing world at his feet. The number of letters that Vidal received at this time from publishers and editors of magazines was so great that he began to find the mere answering of them a serious tax upon his leisure; and if he could have accepted all the engagements offered to him, his fortune would have been made.

Nor was it only in this practical fashion that his success was acknowledged. The circle of his friends and acquaintances, always a large one, became so wide, now that he was a celebrity, as to be almost unmanageable. Parliament had met, London was filling fast, and it appeared as if everybody who did not already know the talented author of "Two Lovers," was dying to be introduced to him. The roadway of Alexandra-gardens, which was, in general, unaccustomed to traffic and required but little attention from the parochial authorities, was cut up by the wheels of the carriages which stopped at the door of No. 12; Clare's card-tray was filled to overflowing, and invitations to dinner arrived at every hour of the day.

The young man's head was not turned by all this adulation, which indeed he was sensible enough to know that he had done very little to deserve. He was astonished and rather amused at it; personally, he did not much care about stories that were frankly stories and nothing more; he still thought the work which had brought him into such prominence vastly inferior to its predecessor; he was inclined, like Voltaire, to exclaim, "Les honneurs et les biens pleuvent enfin sur moi Pour une comédie de la foire!" Nevertheless, he thoroughly enjoyed being made much of. He accepted the invitations which bore his wife's name as well as his own, and declined those in which her existence was ignored. He basked in the sunshine of social renown, giving himself no airs, but receiving the compliments paid him with an innocent gratification which finished the conquest of his admirers' hearts. There are men with whom notoriety does not agree, just as there are plants which suffer by being taken out of the shade. Others, again, require light and warmth to bring out what is best in them, and to this latter category Adrian Vidal belonged.

"I can't pretend to be above caring whether people are kind to me or not," he said once to Clare, whose thirst for applause was soon slaked, and who was getting tired of dining out every night. "I like to be liked: it's a harmless weakness."

"Yes," she agreed, rather dubiously; "it is pleasant to be liked for one's own sake; but to be liked only because one has done something out of the common—I don't know whether that is such a good thing. And how can one tell that it will last?"

"Oh, it won't last," answered Adrian, shrugging his shoulders. "All the more reason for making the most of it while it does." And then he laughingly told his wife that she was a misanthrope, and went up stairs to dress for dinner.

It occasionally happened now that Clare sat down to a solitary meal. As has been said before, Vidal made it a rule to decline all invitations in which she was not included; but some invitations reached him in which it was impossible that she should be included, and which prudence forbade him to refuse. On this evening, for instance, he had been asked to dine at the Acropolis Club to meet a certain Mr. Pilkington, whose position as a man of letters was of the first rank, and who was considered by his disciples to be a sort of English Sainte-Beuve. Whether Mr. Pilkington had ever made good his title to be so considered was of course a question which admitted of two answers; but his style of writing was certainly graceful and impartial, and he had a high opinion of his own abilities, which always counts for something. He had at one time been editor of a review famous for its dogmatic utterances on science, philosophy, and religion, but had resigned the post on finding that it involved him in controversies which were not to his taste. He was well known in society, and passed for being an ambitious man; though he seldom said or did anything to justify that supposition. Being possessed of a moderate fortune, he was not dependent upon his pen for a livelihood, and only wrote when he felt so disposed. Latterly, he had written little; but whenever an article signed by him appeared, it was read with interest and respect. A fair scholar and an excellent critic, he prided himself upon his gift of discrimination, and would sometimes take a young author by the hand, to the delight of that young author, and prophesy great things of him. However, he did not now do this so frequently as in former years, some of his protégés having in the most unscrupulous manner falsified his predictions.

When Vidal was asked to meet this gentleman, whom as yet he knew only by repute, he felt that a high compliment was being paid to him. His host—one Egerton, a well-to-do middle-aged bachelor, who liked to play Mæcenas upon a small scale, and made a point of knowing all authors, was just the sort of man to whom Mr. Pilkington would have been likely to apply had he been desirous of meeting a fresh writer of promise, and Vidal was disposed to think that some such desire must have been intimated. Moreover, a rumour had reached him that Pilkington was about to start a new magazine or review, and he had some faint hope that he was going to be asked to contribute to this. As far as promises to provide fiction were concerned, he already had his hands full; but he would willingly have resigned one of these more lucrative engagements for the honour of being named among the select band over which the great Pilkington might be expected to preside.

Egerton, stout, grey-haired, good-humoured, and somewhat fussy in manner, met him as he entered the hall of the Acropolis, and held him by the hand while he murmured confidentially, "So glad you were able to come! Pilkington hasn't turned up yet; but he'll be here directly, I suppose. Very anxious to make your acquaintance—asked me a heap of questions about you. You'll find him an uncommonly pleasant fellow, when you know him—a little stiff, some people think. Quiet, you know—not much gush about him; but when he says a thing, you may be sure that he means it."

This exordium sounded promising. It was evident that Mr. Pilkington had been saying, or was going to say, something to the advantage of the person addressed. Vidal made an appropriate response, and his entertainer, turning to a tall, cadaverous-looking man who was perusing the play-bills on the wall, went on:

"I don't know whether you know Percy Kean. Kean, let me introduce you to Mr. Vidal—'Two Lovers,' you know—celebrated author."

The last words would perhaps have been more fittingly applied to the elder than to the younger of the two men thus presented to one another. Percy Kean had tried his hand at various branches of literature, and, during a career of something like twenty years, had been moderately successful in everything that he had attempted. His comedies generally drew full houses; his humorous verses, if they did not quite entitle him to call himself a poet, were widely read; he was connected with several weekly journals, and was reputed to be the writer of some political skits which had at different times amused those who understood them. He took a large bony hand out of his pocket and extended it to Adrian, saying, "Glad to see you. I wish the other man would come!"

But the other man did not come for half an hour, and when he did come, made no apology for being late. Vidal was a little disappointed in his appearance, which was rather that of an elderly man of fashion than of an eminent scholar. His hair, which was turning grey at the temples, was parted in the middle and carefully brushed; he wore a short, trim beard, and had an eye-glass tightly screwed into his right eye. He spoke in a low, deliberate voice, pronouncing his vowels very broadly, and was a shade too conscious of being the most distinguished person present. It may be that Vidal was also somewhat disappointed by the reception accorded to him. He had been prepared for a cordial shake of the hand, and possibly a graceful reference to his book; but all that he got from the great man was a bow, accompanied by an indistinct murmur; and then Egerton said, briskly: "Well, suppose we go in to dinner."

When the four men were seated in the spacious strangers' room, and were doing justice to the cooking, for which the Acropolis enjoys a well-deserved celebrity, Mr. Pilkington began to talk, and talked pleasantly enough upon a variety of subjects, of which literature was not one. Indeed, he seemed disinclined to enter upon this particular topic, and ignored several attempts on the part of his good-humoured host to introduce it. He had the placid air of being assured that what he said would be listened to which characterises superior beings. He spoke with a polished fluency that reminded Vidal very much of his writings; he could count upon at least one appreciative hearer in Egerton, and paid little heed to the occasional caustic comments with which Kean broke in upon his periods. When these interruptions occurred, Pilkington paused for a moment, smiled courteously, and then resumed his discourse, without making any direct reply. Evidently, he did not think much of Kean, and somehow or other, it seemed rather as if Kean did not think much of him. It was not until dinner was nearly over that a question of Egerton's caused him to say a few words about the craft to which three out of this party of four belonged; and then Vidal obtained the little compliment that he had ceased to expect.

"By-the-way, Pilkington, how did you like ——'s book?" Egerton asked, referring to a novel which had recently appeared and which had created some sensation, less by reason of intrinsic merits than of the sweeping indictment which it contained against the morality of the age.

Pilkington leant back in his chair and balanced his dessert-knife upon his fore-finger. "I should say," he replied, in his quiet, deliberate way, "that —— had better stick to the kind of writing by which he made his name and let novels alone. He has a certain smartness—a certain facility: he treats the problems of life with that sort of lightheartedness which is always welcomed by people who like to have their thinking done for them; but he seems to be entirely wanting in creative power. His novel is not a true picture of the men and women of the day, and what is worse is that it is unpleasing. Nowadays, we don't like coarse attacks and knock-down blows. The kind of hard hitting that amused our fathers, offends us; and it would be almost as disagreeable to us to read such another onslaught as Macaulay made upon Robert Montgomery as to see a man throw a glass of wine in his neighbour's face. The present generation is sometimes accused of being too thin-skinned to appreciate satire. I should venture to doubt the justice of that accusation; but I am sure that it's now more than ever a necessary condition of satire that it should have some humour in it and also some kindliness. To be effective, it must be such satire as Thackeray's—or as yours," he added, with a little bow to the young man who was sitting opposite to him.

Adrian felt himself reddening with pleasure. The speaker might not, and probably did not, intend that too literal an inference should be drawn from his remark; but that incidental coupling of Vidal's name with Thackeray's was certainly a very pretty way of acknowledging such merits as the former might possess. Egerton stretched out his left leg and stealthily kicked his young friend under the table, as who should say, "There! I hope you're satisfied with that!" Kean threw back his head, widened his mouth from ear to ear, and contemplated the ceiling.

Thinking over this pantomime afterwards, Adrian was led to conclude that Mr. Kean either did not believe in Pilkington's sincerity or differed from him in opinion. Upon the whole, he did not particularly like Mr. Kean. Towards Pilkington, on the other hand, he could not help feeling drawn; and after an adjournment had been made to the smoking-room, he was glad to find himself alone for a few minutes with that gentleman, Egerton having (not without intention, probably) taken away his other guest to examine some ventilators which had lately been put up.

Pilkington said at once what Adrian had half hoped that he might be going to say. "I don't know whether anyone has told you, Mr. Vidal, that I have been asked to undertake the editorship of a new magazine."

"I heard something about it," answered Vidal.

"I say a magazine," the other went on, "for want of a better name; but in reality our new venture will be more or less sui generis. It will have something of the magazine in it; but it will also have something of the review and something of the newspaper. What I wish to do is to provide people with a sort of—er—survey of each month as it comes to an end. Not, of course, a mere résumé of events; but a series of articles, written by first-class men, on what is taking place in literature, science, art, and society. I had at first thought of excluding politics; but I begin to see that this is scarcely practicable. There will, therefore, be a political article, which I shall undertake myself—not because I feel any special aptitude that way, but because, oddly enough, I cannot lay my hand upon a single other man who is wholly free from party bias. In this, as in all other departments, I am anxious that the paper should take an attitude of absolute independence. Each writer will express his own views and sign his own name at the foot of them. I think I can say that in every instance the named signed will at least be a guarantee of competence. The articles will be shorter, lighter, and far more numerous than those of the ordinary half-crown magazine. Perhaps I may add that they will also be more readable: at all events, it will be our aim to make them so. In addition to these articles, I have consented—somewhat unwillingly, I must confess—to publish a serial story; and I am in hopes that some day you may be induced to let us have a novel from your pen. At present, I am too deeply pledged to make further arrangements in that direction; but I should be glad if you saw your way to join us as a permanent member of our staff. In that case, I should ask you to furnish us with a monthly article on current light literature, English, French, and American."

There was a short pause, during which Pilkington sipped his coffee and blew a cloud of smoke from the cigarette which he held between his fingers. Then Adrian said—what was indeed the truth—that he felt exceedingly flattered by the offer made to him, and asked nothing better than to accept it. "But," he added, with a slight laugh, "I am afraid my name can't be considered as one of those which are a guarantee of competence."

Pilkington waved his hand and smiled pleasantly. "You must allow me to hold a different opinion," he replied. "It is true that you have done nothing yet in the way of criticism—or at least, if you have, I have no knowledge of the fact—but I have the vanity to think that I can judge of a man's capabilities without asking him for direct evidence of them. From what I have seen of your writings, I am satisfied that you will suit us, if our terms suit you."

He then named the terms in question, which struck Adrian as extremely liberal, and the bargain was concluded just as the two other men returned. Pilkington did not think it necessary to change the subject.

"I have been persuading Mr. Vidal to give us his co-operation in our new magazine," he remarked.

"Dear me!" cried Egerton. "Vidal, I congratulate you: it's a grand opening. Not that you need an opening; still it isn't everyone who would have such a chance given him, you know."

"You may congratulate me too, if you like," said Pilkington, with ready tact; whereupon his friend responded heartily: "Of course—of course! Congratulate you both most sincerely."

"Oh, ah!—the new magazine," murmured Kean, dropping his long, gaunt person into an arm-chair. "I'm in it, too, ain't I, Pilkington?"

"As an occasional contributor," replied that gentleman, serenely.

"Oh yes: I know I'm only a casual. By-the-way, have you hit upon a name for the thing yet?"

"Well, no," answered the future editor; "I can't say that I have come to a final decision. I should have liked to find something that would convey an idea of the light character of the publication—because, although we shall have to treat of serious subjects, we don't want to be heavy—but, unfortunately, all the best titles have been appropriated. Figaro, for instance, would have suited us very well—or The Owl."

"Why not the Ostrich?" suggested Kean. "The omnivorous ostrich—he's the bird for you. Politics, fiction, science, slander—buns, broken glass, tenpenny nails—nothing comes amiss to him. Call it the Ostrich, Pilkington."

"I'm afraid that wouldn't do," said Pilkington. "The ostrich is chiefly known to the public for habits which we should be sorry to impute to ourselves as clear-sighted observers."

"Well, then," said the other, "let's ring for a dictionary, and search it through till we get an idea. I've tried that plan before now with the happiest results." And he suited the action to the word.

It seemed possible that Mr. Kean had taken just half a glass too much champagne. His tone evinced a disrespectful tendency to make fun of the new magazine, if not of its promoter. But Pilkington remained unruffled. It would have taken a very different man from Kean to disturb his courtesy, his kindly toleration of human folly, his modest but firm belief in himself.

"I don't know that names are of any great importance," he continued; "the generality of newspapers and magazines have names which are comparatively meaningless. Still, in choosing a new one, it would be desirable, if it were possible, to give some sort of clue to one's intention."

"Just so," agreed Egerton. "Now you, I take it, want to be understood as intelligent and disinterested spectators of what is going on around you. In short, a band of cultured men and men of the world, associated together for the purpose of—of—well, for journalistic purposes; but tied down to no special line, and ready to judge every question upon its merits."

"Yes; but, unfortunately, you can't very well put all that into one word," said Pilkington. "All things considered, I am afraid we shall have to content ourselves with a pis-aller. 'The Empire' has been suggested to me, and also 'Great Britain'; but I am inclined to something more inclusive. 'The Anglo-Saxon,' for example. But really it does not much signify."

"'The Anglo-Saxon' would take in America and the colonies," observed Egerton, thoughtfully.

"Who might otherwise consider themselves slighted," broke in Kean, looking up from the dictionary which he had been studying. "I've got lots of good names here, though. The A.'s don't come out very well; the 'Amalgam' and the 'Anomaly' are all I can do for you in the way of A.'s; but we improve as we go on. I'll just read you out my list: 'The Balance' (capital name that for an impartial paper. Weigh everybody and find everybody wanting, you know)—the 'Butterfly,' the 'Buttonholer,' the 'Bore,' the"——

"Oh, I say, Kean, come now!" remonstrated Egerton.

Pilkington preserved his lenient smile as he rose and bade his host good-night. "I think we shall have to stick to the 'Anglo-Saxon,'" he said; "unless Mr. Vidal can help us to something better."

He took the young man familiarly by the arm and led him towards the door. "There's one thing more I had intended to mention. Our paper will not be the property of any publishing firm. We considered it best not to hamper ourselves in that way. The bulk of the capital is provided by private individuals who are not themselves literary men; but all our permanent contributors have some small pecuniary interest in the undertaking. In many ways I think it is well that this should be so, and if you like to place a trifle—say a couple of thousand pounds—in our hands, I hope you will have no cause to regret having done so."

Vidal felt rather uncomfortable. Two thousand pounds was not exactly his notion of a trifle; and, as a married man, he doubted whether he had any business to go in for sporting investments.

"Of course," continued Pilkington, who was now getting into his great-coat, "I can't say what rate of interest you would receive. It might be fifty per cent or it might be five."

"Or it might be nothing," Vidal ventured to suggest.

"Or it might be nothing. Every new enterprise is speculative, and cannot be otherwise. I need not say that you are under no sort of obligation to run what you may consider a risk; and of course it does not signify at all to us, in a pecuniary sense, whether you accept our offer or not. My own feeling in the matter is simply this: that having a money interest, however small, in a paper helps a man more than anything else to identify himself with it, and to put his best work into it."

"He has his salary," remarked Vidal.

"Oh, yes; he has his salary, no doubt. Well, you can think it over, Mr. Vidal, and let me know what your wishes are in the course of a few days. Good-night."

These last words were spoken upon the doorstep of the club, from which Pilkington was driven away in his brougham. Adrian perceived that he would have to risk those two thousand pounds, and he was rather sorry that he had not at once yielded with a good grace, instead of seeming to hint at doubts by which his future chief had evidently been ever so slightly offended. It would not do to offend Pilkington, he thought; but at the same time he would have preferred to keep his money in his pocket. Careless and hopeful though he was, he had enough of common-sense to be aware that the new magazine might be excellently written and excellently conducted, and yet fail to establish a footing. Turning pensively back into the hall he encountered Kean, who was coming out, and who proposed to walk as far as Piccadilly with him.

"So you are to do the monthly review of fiction for the 'Anglo-Saxon,'" he remarked, when they were out in the street. "You never tried anything of the kind before, I suppose? Ah; I thought not. It's an original idea, that of Pilkington's, to put all his square men into the round holes, and I shouldn't wonder if it were to take. A sonnet by an eminent scientific writer, a serial story by a Bishop, and so on, ought to tickle the fancy of the jaded public, eh? Pilkington isn't quite the Solomon that he gets credit for being; but he's no fool either."

"Do you think the 'Anglo-Saxon' is likely to pay?" asked Vidal, who was more interested for the moment in this question than in Mr. Pilkington's reputation.

"I don't know why it shouldn't. It's a novelty—neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring; and the first few numbers are sure to be read. We shall know more about it by this time next year; but at present I should say it had a fair chance of success. Personally, I don't much care whether it sinks or swims."

"The difference between us," thought Vidal, "is that I do." But he did not say this, and as he drove homewards he took some comfort from the thought that, since all the contributors were in the same boat, they would, as their editor had astutely observed, certainly do their best to keep it afloat.

LENT LILIES.

Fashion has many freaks and fancies, and busies herself from time to time with matters that have nothing to do with our raiment, though they may exercise considerable influence on our lives. For some years she has decreed that our rooms, as well as our persons, should be adorned with real flowers—not merely the conventional gardenia or rose in our button-holes, or the carefully arranged bouquet on table or sideboard, but with masses of whatever blossoms may happen to be in season. It is, of course, reserved for American millionaires and Russian magnates to have roses at Christmas and eucharis all the year round: they are exceptions to the general rule. But the real benefit Fashion has for once conferred on the great middle class is that she has brought field flowers in immense quantities to their very doors, and made it de rigueur to use them in masses.

The starry celandine has not yet come into favour; but that is no doubt owing to its perverse habit of closing whenever it is not in the full blaze of sunshine. But sheaves of the delicate though long-despised faintly-tinted "milkmaids" or "lady's smocks," of blue hyacinths, wood anemones, and, though last, not least, Lent lilies, have come to be marketable commodities, and eagerly purchased for the purpose of putting into brown, red, green, or yellow jars, and making desirable "bits" of colouring.

Lovely Lent lilies! their day has come at last, and for at least six weeks they queen it all over England. They are the "fair daffodils" of Herrick; but several generations came after Herrick and failed to recognise their beauties. The big, heavy, flaunting double daffodils of cottage gardens and shrubberies were considered "well enough in their place," but were seldom gathered, and no one gave so much as a thought to their delicate single sisters in the marshy fields and damp woodlands.

The late Gabriel Dante Rossetti may be claimed as the apostle of the Lent lily, for he painted her several times with a lover's touch; though of course with him flowers were secondary to faces. Nevertheless, when he did paint flowers it was with such marvellous delicacy that they bloom eternally on his canvas.

Wordsworth, who was in all the secrets of Nature, sang of

> A host of golden daffodils,
> Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
> Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

But other popular writers seem scarcely to have noticed them. Miss Mitford accorded scant mention to the Lent lily; and even the Howitts had little or no enthusiasm for it.

In these days we must be learned and exact, so it is only right to record that, botanically speaking, the wild single daffodil is the Narcissus pseudo-narcissus; and also that, in spite of its elegance and beauty, there is nothing utilitarian about it. Herbalists and such like people learned in simples have never found out that it is good for anything; and in the whole pharmacopœia there is no single reference to it. Our French neighbours call it the fleur d'asphodèle, and our own country-folk in the southern counties speak of the flower collectively as "daffs," "daffies," and "daffy-down-dillies."

In Middlesex, Surrey, Hants, and "Darset dear," as Mr. Barnes calls that bewitching county, Lent lilies, with their scanty amber petticoats and translucent primrose-tinted paniers, grow abundantly in the flat lands, making their appearance about the first week in March, and "hasting away" in the middle of April. Sometimes they are found in a moist wood, as, for instance, near Wroxall, in the Isle of Wight. A clay soil delights them, but they are not fond of chalk, sand, or gravel, though if the bulbs are transplanted thither they flourish and do well after the first season or two. Each bulb bears only one blossom, but so thickly are they often crowded together that it seems impossible even to thin them by gathering. Fifteen years ago, Lent lilies were scarcely ever plucked, save by a few disciples of nature, even in districts where they grow most plentifully. A rough and rustic Dorsetshire "maiden" and a poor curate's wife in the same county tried hard to point out their beauties to all and sundry with whom they came in contact; but these simple souls lived before their time, and, like others whom the gods have loved and dowered, died young.

Things are changed now, and have been for the last six years or so. Lent lilies have come to the front. Artists paint them for the spring exhibitions, and they figure almost as largely as brambles on the china plaques which annually find a temporary home, or at all events a rendezvous, chez Messrs. Howell and James, and divide the palm with the primroses on Easter cards. We wear them as breast-knots, and on our hats and bonnets; we fill our wall pockets and jardinières with them; we make "beau pots" of them in the corners of our rooms. But, however we may expatiate on their form and colour, their grace and winsomeness, we shall never invent for them any more sweet or poetic epithet than the old-fashioned one of "Lent lilies."

By C. W. (Copenhagen).

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in three moves.

The last Australian mail brought us full information of Mr. Blackburne's arrival at Melbourne, and of his first appearance in the chess circles of that city. Mr. Punch's "Boys" of the British Lion received him as sharers of his renown in the world of chess; but they lost no time, nevertheless, in putting his mettle to a practical test. The champion's first exhibition of chess skill at the Antipodes was given on Jan. 8, at the large hall of the Co-operative Society, under the presidency of Judge Williams, when he contested eight games, sans voir and simultaneously, in the presence of over two hundred spectators. Among his opponents on this occasion were some of the most skilful Colonial amateurs, most of them well known in the Mother country as competitors in intercolonial matches. The result of the play in this contest was that Mr. Blackburne won five games against Messrs. Lush, Hamel, Landels, Witton, and Fewing; and drew three games against Messrs. Esling, Loughran, and Stephen. Appended is one of the games played in this match, with notes by Mr. Burns, of Melbourne Leader. Mr. Blackburne played the White and Mr. Fleming the Black pieces.

(Vienna Game.)

WHITE (Mr. B.)	BLACK (Mr. F.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt Q B 3rd	Kt to K B 3rd

The correct answer is 2. Kt to Q B 3rd; the move made leads speedily to a bad game.

3. P to K B 4th	P to Q 3rd

Shutting in his Bishop and getting a very cramped position.

4. B to B 4th	B to Kt 5th
5. Kt to B 3rd	Kt to B 3rd
6. Castles	Kt to Q 5th
7. B to K 2nd	B takes Kt
8. B takes B	P to Q B 3rd

This is bad, as it makes his Q P a weak point, against which White directs his attack presently. P to K B 3rd, making an opening for his Bishop, seems his best resource.

9. P to Q 3rd	B to K 2nd
10. B to K 3rd	Kt to K 3rd

10. Kt takes B would have been better; but, in any case, his game is now greatly compromised.

11. P to B 5th

Taking full advantage of Black's errors, obtaining a splendid position.

11.	Kt to B 2nd
12. P to Q 4th	Kt to Q 2nd
13. Q to K 2nd	B to B 3rd
14. Q R to Q sq	Q to K 2nd
15. Q to B 2nd	P to Q R 3rd

15. P takes P, followed by 16. B to K 4th, would have relieved his game. White dare not in that case take the B P, on account of the reply, P to Q B 4th.

16 Kt to K 2nd	P to B 4th

A bad move, which gives White the desired opening at Q 5th. 16. P takes P would have been much better.

17. P takes B P	Kt takes P
18. Kt to B 3rd

Immediately seizing the opportunity of forcing an entrance for his Rook at Q 5th, and doubling on the Queen's file.

WHITE (Mr. B.)	BLACK (Mr. F.)
19. Kt to Q 5th	Castles (K R)
20. R takes Kt	Kt takes Kt
21. K R to Q sq	Q R to Q B sq
22. B takes Kt	R to B 3rd
23. R to Q 7th	P takes B
24. R takes Kt P	R to B sq
25. Q R to Q 7th

To prevent Black getting possession of the Queen's file, by R to Q sq.

25.	B to K 2nd
26. Q to Q 2nd	R to Q sq
27. B to K 2nd	P to Q R 4th
28. B to B 4th	B to K 4th

An error which ought to have lost the game at once.

29. Q to Q 6th

Good enough to win; but 29. Q takes B would have forced the game in a few moves—ex. gr.:

29. Q takes B	R t. kes R
30. P to B 6th	R takes R (ch)
31. K to B 2nd	R to Q 7th (ch)
32. K to K 3rd,

and Black cannot avoid the mate.

29.	R takes R
30. Q takes R	Q to Q Kt sq
31. P to Q Kt 3rd	K to R sq

In the vain hope that White might be tempted to take the B P, and so enable him to play R to Q sq.

32. Q to Q 6th

This speedily forces the game.

32.	Q takes Q
33. R takes Q	K to Kt sq
34. K to B 2nd	R to Q sq
35. R to Q B 6th	B to K 2nd

Checking with the Rook would have been unavailable.

36. R to B 7th	K to B sq
37. R to R 7th	K to K sq
38. B to Q 8th	B to Kt 4th
39. B takes P (ch),

and Black resigned.

A meeting of the Dover Chess Club was held on Wednesday week, when a match was played between the clerical and medical members, which resulted in a victory for the former by five games to one and three drawn. At the conclusion of play, the president, Sir Richard Dickeson, presented the prizes to the winners in the Challenge and other tournaments. The Challenge prize, a set of ivory Staunton chessmen and a morocco chessboard, was won by Mr. Charles Wood, M.R.C.S. The prize in the other tournament, a silver Queen, was won by the Rev. Tudor Craig. The president then proceeded to say that the services of the honorary secretary, Mr. Allan T. Wilson, were unanimously recognised by the members, and that he had been asked to offer for Mr. Wilson's acceptance a "statu quo" chessboard and men with the best wishes of the club. The evening terminated with an oyster supper.

A match between the University and the City of Oxford was played on the 27th ult. There were fourteen players a side, and the University won by 16½ to 10½.

On the 26th ult. a match was played between Burnsley and Wakefield, which resulted in a victory for the former by 9½ games to 4½; and, on the previous evening, the Athenæum, Camden Town, scored 8½ in a match against 1½ for the London and Westminster Bank.

M. Tschigorin, who became well known to English chessplayers through the London International Competition of 1883, gave an interesting exhibition of chess sans voir, at the St. Petersburg Chess Club, on the 22nd ult. He was opposed by ten adversaries simultaneously, and the contest resulted in M. Tschigorin winning eight games, losing one, and drawing one. One of his adversaries, M. Arnold, played also without sight of the board. For the score of this game we are indebted to the courtesy of Dr. Rosuski, of St. Petersburg, and shall have pleasure in publishing it next week.

A match between Bath and district and Bristol and Clifton was played on the 26th ult., and resulted in the former winning nine games against their adversaries' eight.

A pretty two-move problem from Humoristicke Listy, by Jan Benes, of Prague:—

White: K at K R 8th, R at Q Kt 6th, Kts at K R 2nd and K B 4th, B at Q R 3rd, Pawns at Q 2nd and 3rd, and K R 4th. (Eight pieces.)
Black: K at K 4th, Kt at K B 4th, Pawn at K B 2nd. (Three pieces.)
White to play, and mate in two moves.

The testator leaves £300 per annum to his wife, Mrs. Rebecca Georgiana Champion, for life; and the residue of his real and personal estate, upon trust, for his son, Reginald. In the event of his said son dying under the age of twenty-five without leaving issue, the income of the residue is to be paid to his mother, Mrs. Mary Champion, for life, and at her death the principal divided between the British Orphan Asylum, Slough, and the Royal Hospital for Incurables, West-hill, Putney-heath.

The testator, having by his marriage contract agreed that his domicile should be at Antwerp, and that the disposition of his property should be governed by the Belgian law, leaves one moiety of his property to his six children, in equal shares; one fourth to his wife, absolutely; and the usufruct of the remaining fourth to his wife.

The will (dated Jan. 5, 1884) of Mrs. Mary Crowdy, late of The Lawn, Southsea-hill, Reading, who died on Dec. 31 last, was proved on the 4th ult. by Mrs. Mary Hall, the niece, William Weedon, and John Alexander Strachan, the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £42,000. There are numerous bequests to relatives and others; and the residue of her real and personal estate the testatrix leaves to Thomas Wright Little, Andrew George Little, and John Francis Willes Little.

The will (dated Oct. 14, 1884) of the Rev. Edward James Justinian George Edwards, Prebendary of Lichfield Cathedral, late of Trentham, Staffordshire, who died on Nov. 27 last, at No. 34, York-terrace, was proved on the 12th ult. by Justinian Heathcote Edwards Heathcote, and James Edwards, the sons, and Samuel Herbert Cooper, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £39,000. Two freehold properties in Staffordshire and Cheshire he gives to his son Eustace Gresley Edwards; and his real estate in Leicestershire, and the residue of his real estate, to his son James Edwards. The residue of his personal estate is to be divided between his children, James Edwards, Eustace Gresley Edwards, Mrs. Cooper, Mrs. Clarke, Edith Lindsay Edwards, Isabel Edwards, and Adeline Edwards. He makes no provision for his eldest son, as he has succeeded to his uncle's estate.

The ultimate residue of his property is to be held, upon trust, for his wife, for life, and then for his children, the son's share to be double the share of each of his daughters. The provision made for his children is in addition to that already made for them by settlement.

The will (dated May 14, 1875), with five codicils, of Mr. Henry Romilly, late of Huntingdon Park, near Kingston, Herefordshire, who died on Dec. 25 last, was proved on the 7th ult. by Charles Romilly and Lieutenant Colonel Frederick Romilly, the brothers, two of the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £29,000. The residue of the personalty he gives to his wife, absolutely.

The will (dated April 15, 1878), with a codicil (dated June 16, 1881), of Mr. John Whichcord, F.S.A., architect and surveyor, late of Palace-chambers, No. 9, Bridge-street, Westminster, and of No. 23, Inverness-terrace, Bayswater, who died on Jan. 9 last, was proved on the 14th ult. by Mrs. Marian Emma Whichcord, the widow, and Frederick Charles Thomas, the acting executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £20,000. The testator bequeaths £300 and all his wines and consumable stores to his wife, and £50 to his executor, Mr. Thomas. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, for his wife, for life or widowhood, she maintaining, educating, and bringing up his children, and then for all his children in equal shares. The deceased was president in 1879 and 1880 of the Royal Institute of British Architects.

NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Alfred Austin's muse, like good wine, has grown rich and mellow with age. He is a copious writer, possibly a little too copious; and it has been our lot to read all or nearly all his poetry, from "The Season," published more than twenty years ago, to "The Human Tragedy," and "Savonarola." With the "Soliloquies in Song" we are less familiar; but, putting that volume aside, it needs no high critical faculty to say that in At the Gate of the Convent, and other Poems (Macmillan and Co.), Mr. Austin has attained the high-water mark of his genius. Doubtless, there is more of pretension, of labour, of elaboration, in the earlier works; but there is, we think, less of spontaneity and of that simple lyrical flow, the expression of strong emotion and concealed art, in which this writer excels. In these days of confused poetical utterance, when poetasters are apt to hide their lack of genius under the mask of obscurity, it is delightful to find an author who can say out what is in him in language as clear as the mountain streams to which he loves to listen. Like those streams, Mr. Austin wanders with unchartered freedom, and sometimes seems to make his way too easily; but in his most diffusive verse he is almost always true to Nature and to the human life which gives to Nature her significance. We say almost always, for, curiously enough, the opening couplet of this volume contains what is surely a physiological inaccuracy, as well as an indication of bad taste. Apart from this slight flaw, the "Prelude" is a beautiful confession of the way in which Nature has been teaching the writer from his earliest infancy; and what he gained then he holds fast still; and so it is that when spring comes he can say:—

> I feel no more the snow of years,
> Sap mounts and pulses bound;
> My eyes are filled with happy tears,
> My ears with happy sound.
> . . . . . .
> My manhood keeps the dew of morn,
> And what I have I give;
> Being right glad that I was born,
> And thankful that I live.

In the poem, comparatively a short one, that gives its name to the volume the education of Nature still forms the poet's theme. After a night spent at a convent, he is bidding the friar farewell, when the old man, taking his hand, prays him to remain with him, using, with poetic fervour, the familiar arguments in favour of what is supposed to be a holy life. The poet, on the other hand, has his arguments for loving everything that is lovely, and using all God's gifts as best he may. So he will reap the heaven about his feet still, and, saying farewell, vows

> To found a convent in his breast
> And keep a cloister in his heart.

The Father returns to his prayers, the singer to the world; and he adds,

> But I have kept my vow. And when
> The cuckoo chuckleth o'er his theft,
> When throstles sing again, again,
> And runnels gambol down the cleft,
> With these I roam, I sing with those;
> And should the world with sm les or jeers
> Provoke or lure, my lids I close,
> And draw a cowl about my ears.

Our remarks and quotations will suffice to show the motif of the volume, though not its beauty. To appreciate that, the book must be read, and read carefully. If space would allow, we should like to quote such poems as "The Spring-Time," "A Rare Guest," "To Beatrice Stuart-Wortley," and a fine Shakspearean sonnet called "Love's Fitfulness." "A Te Deum" has some beautiful stanzas, but it is marred by a false theology. No one who acknowledges a Divine Being will praise him for the sin and misery caused by the direct act of man, yet Mr. Austin does not scruple to write

> Thanks for all things that are,
> For the fair, the foul, the fell;
> Thanks for the morning star,
> And the nethermost murk of Hell.
> For the bliss of a dewy dell,
> When lover and maiden meet,
> And the venal kisses they sell,
> In the shade of the lamp-lit street.

It will be seen that the poet's Pegasus sometimes runs away with him.

Great facility of expression and much fantastic fancy are to be found in The Three Sheiks, an Oriental Narrative, and The Fishers, a Contata, by Henry Rose (Isbister). The writer can at least boast that he is not prosaic, and that his poetical narrative is Oriental in character. It does not, however, follow that because, like the wild dream of Southey's "Curse of Kehama," "The Three Sheiks" belongs to no real world the conceptions of the writer have their source in the imagination, which is the special gift of a poet. Give but reins to the fancy, and the most impossible occurrences assume for the moment reality. The wildest extravagances are permissible in Oriental tales, whether in verse or prose; and if one of the Three Sheiks sails by a sea of fire, rides upon a "camel of the Heavens," finds a crystal, and destroys the power of a magician, and another discovers infinite treasure in a cave under the sea, the reader will not be surprised. The point of interest, both for critic and reader, is not so much the outward form of the verse as its inward power. Does the author look at Nature and life, no matter how fantastic the incidents of his narrative, with the vision of a poet? Can he see and can he sing? We fear these questions must be answered in the negative. Mr. Rose has plenty of ability, but we search the volume in vain for indications of the "faculty divine."

The Hon. Roden Noel has written several volumes of poetry and won golden opinions from the critics. In Songs of the Heights and Deeps (Elliot Stock) he appeals once more to the judgment of the public. It is not always easy to say why some verse, to use a Coleridgean phrase, "finds" us, and why other verse, masterly though it be in execution, fails to make an impression. If we confess that we have read these so-called "songs" unmoved, uncharmed, the poet's answer may be that the fault lies in the reader. Possibly; our ear is, perhaps, at fault in thinking the verse unmusical, our insight, in deeming it in a measure laboured and artificial. The reviewer, who knows how liable he is to err, can but give a reason for his judgment. It seems to us, then, that there is far more of laborious effort in these poems than of the imagination that creates or of the emotion that inspires. Mr. Noel's verses are never weak, and his moral is high; but we miss the spontaneity, the élan, the passion, which make poetry impressive and fix it in the memory and heart. The first poem in the volume, "A Lay of Civilisation," presents some painful scenes of London life—photographic scenes they may be termed in their exactness; yet somehow the pathos fails to touch us, partly, we think, because it is mixed up with much that bears the mark of rhetoric rather than of poetry. "Melcha," the longest poem in the book, must be read with care if the reader would grasp its allegorical significance. In its surface meaning, and as a fairy tale, we regret to say it strikes us as alike confused and uninteresting. Mr. Noel, doubtless, would be able to explain every perplexing allusion in connection with the young lady who is wooed and won by a husband living under the water; but if he be able to make the puzzle easy he cannot win us by the melody of the verse.

> But when the Knight beheld some members of the throng,
> Impetuously he burst forth into song, is verily a harsh couplet; and the following rather puzzling lines describing what Melcha sees in the home of her demon lover grate still more upon the ear:—

> No word is breathed between the shapes who wander.
> On one another's work they reverently ponder;
> Knowing the Lord all over it and under.
> The wisest ask no homage for their names,
> To one all bounteous yielding private claims;
> And where some organising thought, long gleaming
> Upon a column's core, hath left it beaming,
> For ever after, when a follower gazes,
> Reason's high hallowing remains, and blazes
> I' the core of these enchanted chrysopraxes.

The poem on "Byron's Grave" raises a doubtful point in theology; its estimate of the poet, as far as we can judge of it through a haze of rhetoric, strikes us as a false one. With more pleasure we have read "The Death of Livingstone," but there is not a piece in the volume which has given us unalloyed delight.

The volume of essays entitled Euphorion (Fisher Unwin, 1884), from the pen of the lady who writes under the pseudonym of "Vernon Lee," will attract a wider attention than the biting satire on pseudo-aestheticism which is the groundwork of her novel "Miss Brown." It is seldom that a book of such merit as "Euphorion" undoubtedly shows is fitted with a title which is neither a catch-word nor a mere label, but which strikes at the outset the key-note of the author's meaning. "Euphorion," as explorers of the second part of the great German drama well know, was the mystical offspring of Faust and Helena—Faust, the impersonation of the Middle Ages; Helena, the spirit of antiquity. In other words, "Euphorion" is the Renaissance. This idea "Vernon Lee" develops in a series of essays, which, however, must not be taken as the working out of a theory, but rather as a succession of vivid personal impressions. The author is as profoundly stirred by the contemplation of mediæval error as was ever the earnest preacher denouncing the wickedness of his own day. Her historical sympathy, or rather antipathy, is living and passionate. The union of the spirit of antiquity with the spirit of mediævalism resulted too often in what the author in her exuberant language calls "a foul intermeshing of evil with good." To her Puritan nature the contemplation of this wrong-doing was a pain that ached until it found utterance in protest. Such a pain she believes to be "holy and healthy"; "holy" it may be, but "healthy" certainly not. "Evil which is past," says this burning young prophetess, "is ever present," and must, therefore, ever cause to the "morally sentient being" trouble and indignation. We venture to think that, with regard to some forms of mediæval error, the best sermon is to forget. Happily, Vernon Lee is a delicate critic as well as a fierce moralist. Each essay contains thought enough for an average book. In the "Sacrifice" she shows how, during the period of the Renaissance, whole generations were condemned to moral uncertainty and error "in order that other generations may enjoy knowledge peacefully and guiltlessly." In "Portrait Art" it is refreshing to meet with thoughts that are original, definite, and incisive about terms so hackneyed and so vague as realism and idealism. The "School of Boiardo" is a lucid summary of the metamorphoses of mediæval romance. The "Essay on Mediæval Love" is, perhaps, the least valuable of the series. The author's critical sense compels her to aim at sympathetic analysis; but she allows herself to be carried away by burning indignation, and attains little beyond vituperation, which occasionally oversteps the limits of good taste. In "Italy of the Elizabethan Dramatists," we have a valuable contribution to historical criticism. The Italian Renaissance was in its moral, or rather immoral, aspect what it has been to Vernon Lee herself—a horror and a haunting fascination, something which beset the imagination because so utterly alien. The Renaissance of Italian literature was cheerful and bright—the Italians, steeped in the wrong-doing of their rulers, seeing it daily and hourly, remained healthy and serene: the Renaissance of English tragedy was foul and savage—the English, coming from a purer moral atmosphere, were seized with shame and horror at what they had seen, and could not forget. So Vernon Lee explains, and so we can best explain her own estimate of the past wrong-doings, of which the painful details seem to have left upon her mind a deepor impression than the mental freedom and subsequent moral improvement which were the outcome of the Renaissance.

The author of "The Knave of Hearts" has written a novel called A Woman's Love Story (W. Stevens), which, if it does not display any special originality, is pleasantly exciting and readable throughout. The characters act their parts with propriety, do what we should expect them to do, and there is a consistency in the plot which shows a well-practised hand. Indirectly, by Lilith's mistake and her mother's choice, we are reminded of "Esmond," although in that novel the love of mother and daughter does not clash, as for a time it does here. The beautiful young mother of a plain, eccentric, and highly gifted daughter has had troubles enough to bear, and when at length her cup is filled with joy, it seems as if it were to be suddenly dashed to the ground. There appears a little weakness in the way in which an anonymous letter is allowed to affect the principal dramatis personæ, especially as they were not without a clue to the perpetrators of the shameless act. However, something must be allowed to the exigencies of a story-teller, and on the whole the writer's machinery is managed with considerable skill. The volume, which belongs to a cheap series called "The Family Story-Teller," merits an appearance in a more attractive form.

Two interesting books on the subject of Whist have just been issued from the press, with somewhat different aims. In How to Play Whist, Mr. Richard A. Proctor teaches the learner the rules and regulations which govern the system of "signalling." In the Decline and Fall of Whist, our old friend "Pembridge," of the "Westminster Papers," condemns the system without qualification. There can be no doubt that "signals" have, in recent times, been carried to ridiculous excess. Indeed, Mr. Proctor expresses his sympathy with the objections to their use; but, things being as they are, he believes that it is necessary to understand their meaning for defence, if not for attack. In this opinion most whist-players will agree with him. The most valuable part of this little work is that containing forty games from actual play, and the most amusing is that containing the "Whist whittlings." The "Decline and Fall of Whist" deserves the author's description of it. It is an "old-fashioned view of new-fangled play" put forward with genuine humour of the sarcastic kind. In these two books the learner has the bane and the antidote. Mr. Proctor will persuade him to learn the code, and "Pembridge" will persuade him to avoid its practice.

The Wesleyans have decided to start a mission fund for work in the worst rookeries of London, and to raise a fund of £25,000.

The quarterly court of governors of the Brompton Hospital for Consumption was held on Thursday week in the board-room of the Hospital—Mr. T. P. Beckwith in the chair. The report of the committee of management, read by the secretary, Mr. Dobbin, stated that since the last court the whole of the wards in the two buildings, containing 331 beds, had been occupied, to the great relief of the suffering poor during the most trying period of the year. The committee had been encouraged by the receipt of many new subscriptions, but at the same time funds were needed now more than ever to meet the great increase in the expenses caused by the addition of 137 beds in the new building, which was opened in 1882. The number of in-patients admitted since Nov. 27 was 348; discharged, many greatly benefited, 302; died, 54; new out-patient cases, 3302. The report was unanimously adopted.

Lieutenant Stuart-Wortley. Sir C. Wilson.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: SIR CHARLES WILSON AND HIS PARTY ON THE ISLAND OF MERUAT, AFTER THE WRECK OF THEIR STEAMER.

FROM A SKETCH BY SIR CHARLES WILSON, FORWARDED BY MR. MELTON PRIOR, OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

A more brilliant ball than that of the Honourable Artillery Company on the 4th inst. can scarcely have taken place in the history of this oldest of Volunteer regiments. Graced by the presence of the Prince of Wales in his scarlet uniform as Captain-General and Colonel of the Honourable Artillery Company, the Princess of Wales, radiant in a beautiful dress of pale blue and silver brocade, and wearing a flashing coronet and necklace of diamonds, Prince Edward, the Duke of Cambridge, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Prince Waldemar of Denmark (the Princess of Wales's brother), and M. and Madame Waddington, all of whom entered with spirit into the dancing, the ball was especially noteworthy for the illustrious personages present. The handsome Lieutenant-Colonel, the Duke of Portland, may well have smiled with satisfaction at the glowing scene. In particular good taste were the plenteous floral decorations of the dancing marquee, the long grasses in the baskets pendent from the roof being generally admired. The first Royal quadrille was begun to the familiar tune of "Wait Till the Clouds Roll by, Jenny"; and it was noted that Prince Edward, conspicuous in the blue uniform of the Norfolk Artillery Militia, evidently inherited much of the bonhomie and earnestness of the Prince of Wales, who, by-the-way, graciously expressed to Mr. J. Longden, the secretary of the admirable Ball Committee, his personal gratification at the complete success of the ball.

Every Englishman who reads Shakspeare or sees his plays acted believes that he understands the character of Hamlet. He knows, or thinks he knows, that in the Prince of Denmark we see a mind so sicklied o'er with thought that reflection incapacitates for action. This, though expressed in different ways, is the judgment of Shakspearean critics, from Schlegel to Professor Dowden; but now Mr. George Macdonald has discovered that all the poet's readers have been mistaken and his critics also. In an elaborate "study" of the play just published, the writer states his conviction that Hamlet is remarkable as a man of action—indeed, when a thing has to be done, one of the promptest of men. Mr. Macdonald's judgment is startling, even in days when we are accustomed to the most novel opinions with regard to all matters of literature and art. If, however, his arguments, which is probable, fail to convince, they deserve to be considered; for the critic is no idle writer, and the work in which they are expressed is emphatically a study.

It is fitting that the greatest poet of Scotland and the best song-writer of Great Britain should have the niche in Westminster Abbey which was granted to his bust last Saturday. We wonder, however, what Robert Burns would have thought of this long-delayed honour could he have foreseen it. There was more humour than reverence in his composition, and one can imagine some sly hits at the irony of fate, which made him a gauger in life and ranks him with the great ones of the earth in death. No poet needs a memorial so little; for Burns, like Shakspeare, has built himself a live-long monument in the hearts of all his countrymen. The humblest reader can understand him, the most learned man turns with infinite delight to his pages, and in all grades of society his songs are household words. Burns's highest ambition was to "sing a sang at least" for Scotland's sake. He has done this and more. The sweetest singer of Scotland has not had to be content with these islands as his world. He has conquered both hemispheres.

It is well known that there are in the Mahdi's army a great many foreign officers, and it is not impossible that Roqueplan's story of an occurrence during the Greek war of independence may be enacted over again some day. An officer in Greek uniform was brought before one of the Sultan's generals, and as each shot angry glances at the other, the Hellenic warrior said, as if to himself: "My last hour is come, but the face of this son of Islam is not unknown to me, I fancy I have seen him before." "Leave us alone," ejaculated the Turk; and when he had been obeyed he looked into his captive's eyes, and said, in a voice of thunder, "Gebassier, you owe me ten francs!" The truth was that the men were two of the first Napoleon's old officers, who finding themselves in retirement on half-pay after his fall, had respectively entered the services of Greece and Turkey. The ten francs had been borrowed during the disastrous retreat from Moscow, but the former comrades had never met again till the Turko-Greek campaign once more threw them together.

The island of Madagascar is inhabited by many tribes, one of which, the Betzileo, worship serpents. Many of them have small inclosures near their dwellings where they maintain numbers of these reptiles, and pay them the utmost reverence. Mr. Little, who lived for many years in Madagascar, and was on friendly terms with his neighbours, knew that one family received daily visits from a large forest snake, called it by name, and regarded it with veneration; and, having a great desire to interfere with that particular "doxy," he waylaid the creature one day as it approached the familiar dwelling, and dealt it a death-blow with a club. The tribe rose against him as one man, and he narrowly escaped with his life.

One of the most important exhibits in the French section of the forthcoming Antwerp Exhibition will be a large salle, 300 square yards in extent, in which magnificent specimens of Gobelins and Beauvais tapestry, as well as the national manufactures of Sèvres china and mosaics will be shown. The best and largest piece of Gobelins represents Homère déifié. The French section will probably be guarded by thirty sailors.

Captain Brand, of H.M.S. Swiftsure, our flag-ship on the Pacific station, is a man who knows how to make the amende honorable with a good grace when he finds he has been mistaken. It happened, two or three months ago, that the chief engineer on board this vessel discovered a serious defect in her machinery, and reported it in writing to the captain. This officer could not believe him, and requested that the letter might be withdrawn; and as the chief engineer refused to do it, the opinion of two other engineers was sought. They declared that the machinery was all that it should be, so the protestor was transferred to the Mutine, and the chief engineer of that vessel went to do duty on the Swiftsure during her trip along the coast. When the cruise was over, the engines were examined, and it proved that the original engineer was right. The machinery was completely useless for three days, during which time artificers had to work hard in one of the cylinders at a temperature of 148 degrees to make the defects good. Thereupon Captain Brand reinstated his chief engineer, taking care that he was allowed his full pay while away from his own ship, as well as the proper allowance for extra duties. All's well that ends well, but in this instance there was a very narrow escape from a most disastrous ending.

The Anarchist, Reinsdorff, on the eve of his execution, wrote a touching letter to his brother saying how thankful he was for the prospect of death instead of penal servitude for life, and exhorting him to endeavour to be content with the existing order of things, to cherish and support his father and mother in their old age, and devote himself to the welfare of some younger brothers and sisters. An ounce of example is worth a ton of precept, and time alone will prove whether Bruno Reinsdorff becomes a prominent Anarchist, or whether the daily round and common task of filial and fraternal duty will suffice his soul.

A truly remarkable match at billiards was that won on the 6th inst. (the last day of play) by Mr. John Roberts, jun., titular champion, who conceded 3000 points out of 10,000, and Mr. T. Taylor, sometime candidate for the championship, and likely to be a candidate again. Let the scores speak for themselves: the following are those in which either player scored more than one hundred, chiefly, of course, by the "spot" stroke:—

ROBERTS.

176	344	369	574	111	163	357	417	609	319
109	371	179	321	161	280	574	111	163	357

TAYLOR.

137	344	441	115	171	145	100	111	105	616
295	128	195	630	117	265	284

Mr. Roberts, it will be observed, triumphed by "average"; Mr. Taylor, who lost the match by 1663, nevertheless twice made more in a single "break" than was made in any single break by the champion. The pluck with which the loser played was astonishing; the rapidity with which the winner played was incredible: when he got behind the red for the "screw back" stroke on the "spot," it was like shooting with a repeating rifle, and the attendant could not spot the ball quickly enough. There was some curiosity to see how Mr. Roberts, having for so long played the "all round" game exclusively, would succeed with the "spot stroke"; the curious, no doubt, went home satisfied. Envy itself could not attempt to detract from the splendid play of the champion, who "screwed back" for the "spot stroke" no fewer than sixty-one times consecutively in one break; but it cannot be denied that pockets are easier than they were of old, and it is a question whether they will not have to be made more difficult—for the champion.

M. Jan Van Beers, the Belgian artist whose exhibition of pictures in Bond-street has caused some sensation, requested permission to paint a portrait of the Princess of Wales, and present it to her Royal Highness. The offer has not yet been accepted; but the Prince, who was at a party at Mr. Millais' on Wednesday evening, the 4th inst., commissioned the painter of "Cherry Ripe" to execute a picture of the Princess. As soon as the large Academy work, "The Ornithologist," and the two portraits of Mr. Gladstone are completed, the one of her Royal Highness will be commenced. With such a subject, such an artist cannot fail to make a grand success.

It is the "way of putting it" that makes so much difference. The veracious Osman Digna sums up the list of "our" disasters in the Soudan, during the last two years, thus: "The defeat and annihilation of the army of General Hicks, the defeat of Baker Pasha, the capture of Sinkat and Tokar, the fall of Khartoum, the death of General Gordon, and the retreat of Wolseley, driven back by the Mahdi to Dongola." It is an appalling list at first sight; but, on recovering from the staggers and recalling the memory of El Teb and Tamanieb, we are a little reassured by the reflection that not a single one of the triumphs upon which Osman Digna justly prides himself was won over a British force, that to treachery alone belongs the credit of Khartoum's capture and Gordon's death, and that Wolseley's retreat was a natural consequence of the condition brought about by the treachery, the Mahdi having had little more to do with "driving" him "back" than the shore has to do with driving back the sea at the ebb of the tide.

Here is another instance of what is done by the "way of putting it." Lord Granville thinks that some explanation is due to Prince von Bismarck, and accordingly renders it—handsomely, as his Lordship's habit is. Immediately it is said by the French newspaper La Paix, which is supposed to be the organ of M. Grévy, that "England, proud England, has struck her flag at the summons of M. de Bismarck. The prostration of Lord Granville has made her a satellite, revolving in the Bismarckian orbit." That's good; "satellite" is good; so is "prostration." Then, if you tread on a gentleman's toe and beg his pardon, you grovel at his feet, and your country at once becomes a "satellite" revolving in his orbit.

The Britannia is rather an unlucky ship in the way of epidemics, but not more so than any school on dry land must be, for where a large number of pupils are assembled together, measles, scarlatina, and similar complaints will put in an appearance from time to time. The present outbreak, however, is but slight, and it is hoped that all the cadets will reassemble about the end of the first week in April. By that time, it is probable that Sir Baldwin Wake Walker will be installed as captain; he ought to be the right man in the right place, for he comes of a family which has distinguished itself in the Navy, as well as in other positions, during many generations, and even centuries, from the days of Hereward downwards. Curiously enough, a distant relative, Captain Baldwin Wake, was at the head of a training-ship in Scotch waters some twelve or fifteen years ago, and very pluckily rescued a boy, who had fallen overboard, from drowning. The irony of fate is strange, for he himself ultimately met with a watery grave, being drowned in crossing a river in the Southern States, whither he had emigrated with his family.

The jeunesse dorée long since adopted as their own peculiar button-hole flower a gardenia, probably as much on account of its cost as its beauty and fragrance. Supply was forced to meet demand, and now this blossom is amongst the commonest of exotics. There is, however, a new field open for floral extravagance, and we may yet meet one of the genus "masher" wearing a twenty pound adornment in his evening coat. At a sale of orchids in bloom recently, one specimen was knocked down for no less a sum than one hundred and thirty-one pounds, the purchaser being a Chelsea nurseryman. No doubt the flower was of the rarest and he knows his own business, but until the habitués of the stalls at burlesque theatres declare in favour of the new badge, it is difficult to conceive how the florist will make money out of his expensive treasure.

American actors brought to this country the fashion of self-advertisement, and now the epidemic appears to have reached France. Madame Sarah Bernhardt has taken advantage of a harmless mis-statement to obtrude her patriotism, and appeal to the excitable feelings of a very sensitive body, the French mob. It appears that some journal announced that the great tragédienne was about to perform in Berlin. In olden times a simple denial of the statement would have been deemed sufficient, for, after all, the most eminent artists need not mix themselves up with politics or be prevented from charming the inhabitants of an adjacent country because theirs had been at war with it ten years before. But Madame Bernhardt is terribly indignant at the charge, and declares herself "astonished that a French journalist is capable of putting such an insult into print." Hoighty, toighty! What a storm in a tea-cup! Yet she has been wise, from a business point of view; for since her letter of repudiation, the theatre at which she acts has been nightly filled with an admiring crowd of blue-bloused Parisians, who applaud her for her patriotic letter as well as for her performance in Sardou's "Théodora."

Although Folkestone is a popular and pretty seaside resort, yet it is sadly bare of places of entertainment and exhibitions. Perhaps when visitors go into the country they seek for rest rather than for excitement, and for pure air instead of curiosities. However this may be, there is now a scheme on foot to provide this Kentish watering-place with an art museum, and one most liberal offer has already been made. Mr. Felix Joseph, whose collection of Wedgwood ware is one of the finest in the world, has offered to lend a large portion of his treasures, and has promised in print to make "a permanent gift of certain specimens worthy of acceptance." Mr. Joseph, who was formerly a dealer in works of virtù, is a well-known expert, and what he thinks "worthy of acceptance" by a museum must indeed be valuable. No town should refuse such an offer if there be the slightest chance of the institution being founded and adequately supported.

Many practical English farmers expressed their opinion a couple of years ago that henceforth the only profitable branch of their craft in this country would be dairy farming. And the fact that the average prices of wheat sold in two of the principal markets of Kent during the past week represented a lower figure than has been reached at any time during the last fifty years, seems to show that growing grain does not pay. Having regard to this state of things, Lord Vernon instituted a dairy school on his estate at Sudbury, near Derby, and has now arranged for a course of papers by practical men, to be read periodically on certain evenings in the week. Neighbouring farmers are invited to attend and take part in the discussions, and the railway companies will attach carriages to the late goods-trains for the convenience of visitors living at a distance. This is practical education and no mistake, and Lord Vernon has set an example which wealthy landlords will do well for themselves and their tenants to emulate.

This is a very pathetic world, sometimes. At Plumstead, on the 6th inst., an old man borrowed a horse and cart to get a load of sand from the common. There was a slip of earth on the sandbank, and a report was spread that a boy was buried under the heap. Men set to work, dug the boy out half dead, and sent him to the infirmary, where he was recovered. In the confusion the owner of the horse and cart seems to have taken away the property without inquiring what had become of the borrower, and nobody else thought of inquiring. On the 7th inst. the fallen earth was cleared away, and there lay the old man, dead. Nobody, it seems, made any inquiry about him; nobody, it seems, called him friend or relative; nobody, it seems, even knew his name, for he was known to his neighbours by a nickname only. Such is the story told, and it is full of pathos. "Grant the King a long life" is a reasonable prayer to make; but the poor man might more reasonably pray to die before old age comes upon him, his last friend has left him, and his very name is a mere nickname, bestowed perhaps in mockery.

MUSIC.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

Mr. Rosa's prospectus, just issued, announces (as we have previously stated) the opening of his new London season, to take place on Easter Monday at Drury-Lane Theatre, the performances extending over a period of eight weeks. The comparatively early time of commencement (half-past seven) will be welcome to the many who object to being kept up until past midnight, as at the fashionable opera establishments; and the non-restriction as to evening dress will also be widely approved. Another good arrangement is the issue of subscription tickets—each for twenty-four performances—in two sets, one for Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, the other for Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays—a discount of 10 per cent being allowed off the advertised prices.

The production of "Nadeshda," the new opera on a Russian subject, composed by Mr. Goring Thomas, will be an important event. This, like the same gentleman's "Esmeralda" successfully brought out at Drury-Lane Theatre in 1883, was commissioned specially by Mr. Carl Rosa. English versions of M. Massenet's "Manon" and Signor Boito's "Mefistofele" will be given for the first time in London; and various popular and classical operas will be repeated.

The list of artists contains many well-known names, including those of Madame Marie Roze, Madame Valleria, and Mr. Maas. An efficient orchestra and chorus are engaged; and the conductors will be as before—Mr. Randegger and Mr. E. Goossens. All seems to promise well for a successful eight weeks' season.

Last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert brought forward an overture by Mr. T. Wingham (his fifth work of the kind), originally composed for the Brighton Festival of 1879. It is written in illustration of a motto from Tennyson, and has been reconstructed by the composer since its first production. It is a bright piece of orchestral writing, and was well received. Madame Agnes Miller made a favourable impression at Saturday's concert by her performance of Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in C minor and unaccompanied solo pieces; and vocal music was contributed by Madame Sophie Löwe, Miss A. Sherwin, and Miss L. Little.

The Promenade Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre are still continuing their attractions. The conductorship has recently been transferred to M. Rivière, who is favourably remembered as having acted in the same capacity at similar performances at Covent Garden Theatre. Those now going on at the Haymarket opera-house have just been placed under the general as well as the musical management of M. Rivière. Special features in the programme are the bright vocalisation of Miss A. Sherwin and the skilful performances, on the saxophone, of a gentleman named Looft Ally.

The first of the two Soirées Artistiques given by Mr. Isidore De Lara and M. Henri Logé, at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, took place last week, and included performances by each of the concert-givers. Mr. De Lara sang, with good effect, his own cycle of songs, "To the Palms" (a setting of lines by Lord Lytton), and other pieces; and M. Logé displayed his skill in several pianoforte performances, including works of his own. Some of this gentleman's effective vocal music also entered into the programme. The singing of Madame Hirlemont and Miss Ehrenberg elicited much applause during the evening. Mr. Gompertz, as violinist, and Mr. Levetus, as one of the vocalists, also appeared.

The second of the American concerts, under the direction of Mr. L. Melbourne, took place at Prince's Hall on Monday evening, when a selection of music, partly national, was very effectively rendered by several artists, most of whom are from America.

The Heckmann string quartet party gave their third and last performance of the series of Herr Franke's concerts at Prince's Hall, on Tuesday evening. We have already spoken of the admirable playing of Herr R. Heckmann (the leading violinist) and his coadjutors, Herren O. Forberg, T. Allekotte, and R. Bellmann. These were again manifested in Tuesday's programme, which consisted entirely of Beethoven's music, and comprised the string quartets in C (Op. 59, No. 3) and in C sharp minor (Op. 131). Frau Heckmann played the variations in C minor, for pianoforte solo, with good effect, and she and her husband were associated in an artistic rendering of the Kreutzer sonata.

Mr. Mackenzie's oratorio "The Rose of Sharon" was announced for performance by Mr. Macnaught's choir, at the Bow and Bromley Institute, on Tuesday last. The soloists named were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills.

Madame Adelina Hirlemann gave a concert on Tuesday morning at Metzler and Co.'s concert-rooms.

The Stock Exchange Orchestral Society gave a concert at the St. Andrew's Hall, Newman-street, Oxford-street, last week, in aid of the funds of the Stock Exchange Clerks' Provident Fund. A high-class selection of music was played, with good effect, by a band numbering some sixty or seventy performers. The performances included vocal pieces rendered by Miss Clara Samuell and Mr. Barrington Foote, and a solo for the violin by Mr. H. Sternberg. Mr. G. Kitchin acted as honorary conductor.

Gounod's "Redemption" was given by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society on Wednesday evening, conducted by Mr. Barnby—the artists announced being Madame Valleria, Miss Bertha Moore, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. Santley; Dr. Stainer presiding at the organ.—Next Tuesday evening an Irish Festival will be given at this hall by Mr. William Carter.

The new comic opera by Mr. W. S. Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan is to be produced at the Savoy Theatre this (Saturday) evening. The book is founded on a Japanese subject, and the stage accessories are to be of lavish splendour. The combination of the author's literary skill and humour with the musical genius of Sir A. Sullivan will doubtless result in another great success, similar to that which has attended their previous joint productions.

The Guildhall School of Music announces an orchestral and vocal concert, to take place at the Mansion House this (Saturday) afternoon, under the direction of the Principal, Mr. Weist Hill, and under the patronage of the Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs.

The announcement of performances of French opéra-comique, to be given at the Gaiety Theatre by a company selected from the Paris and Brussels opera establishments, will be welcome to all who can discriminate between the charm of that refined form of dramatic music and the coarseness and flippancy of much of the so-called "opéra-comique"—in reality opéra-bouffe (burlesque). M. Delibe's "Lakmé," Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," and Gounod's "Mireille" are to be given, with the principal character sustained by Mdlle. Vanzandt, who appeared as the heroine in "Lakmé" on its first production in Paris, in 1883. The Gaiety operatic performances will begin on June 6 with "Lakmé," and will alternate with those of French plays.

Of the production of Mr. Gustav Ernest's prize overture, at the second Philharmonic concert of the season (on Thursday evening), we must speak next week.

Mr. J. H. Bonawitz's opera "Irma" will be produced at St. George's Hall next Tuesday evening.

Madame Jenny Viard-Louis will give, next Wednesday afternoon, at Prince's Hall, the fifth and last of the second series of her renderings of Beethoven's works.

After inquiry into the matter, the Music Committee of the London Corporation has recommended that new premises for the Guildhall School of Music should be built on the Victoria Embankment, at a cost of £20,000.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

"Masks and Faces," that capital comedy by Charles Reade and Tom Taylor, alternately witty and pathetic—an excellent example, in fact, of what dramatic dialogue should be—is likely to prove a happy revival at the Haymarket. As years go on, the play is freed from the fetters of tradition, and is allowed to be reinforced by new blood and intelligence. When it was first revived at the little Prince of Wales's Theatre, it would have been heresy to own that as long as the world endured there would ever be a Triplet but Benjamin Webster, ever a Peg Woffington better than Mrs. Stirling. There were some of us in those days who had the courage to declare that Mr. Bancroft's Triplet was a delightful personation—gentle, tender, human, and consistent; but we were laughed at for our pains. There were some of us, also, who pronounced in favour of Mrs. Bancroft's Peg, a character that runs over the whole of the keys of comedy in its widest sense; but our heresy was received with looks of pity. Again, when the play was revived at the Haymarket Theatre, and both Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft became firmer in their seats, it was once more urged, what a delightful Triplet and what a clever Peg could be found even in the new school. But it was whistling to the winds to try and convince the old playgoer. But now that "Masks and Faces" is revived for the third time, round goes the vane of the weathercock opinion, and people are talking of Mr. Bancroft's Triplet and of Mrs. Bancroft's Mistress Woffington as if nobody had ever seen them before, or, what is more to the point, praised them. As an excuse, it is urged that neither actor nor actress ever acted so well before. It may be so; and we cannot complain if an actor hitherto associated with heavy swells can send a blasé 1885 audience into tears, and if an actress of the same period can make them cry again after their first fit of weeping. There is just sufficient sentiment in this play, and not too much; and both Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft are wilfully showing how well they can act, in order to aggravate our disappointment when they really do give up management. To give up acting will not be permitted them, whatever they may think to the contrary. They are not the first artists who have been called out from their retirement with a shout so loud that it cannot be resisted. Next to Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft in artistic excellence, I should be inclined to place Mr. Forbes Robertson as Sir Charles Pomander, and Mr. Barrymore as Ernest Vane. The first is a showy costume part; the last is an extremely difficult one to enact with any credit. There is a great deal of character in Mr. Robertson's Pomander, and welcome earnestness in Mr. Barrymore's personation of the love-struck squire. The majority of the minor characters are spoiled by an excess of colour. It is laid on with a very thick brush by Mr. Brookfield as Colley Cibber, and by Mr. Kemble as Snarl; but possibly it is a fault in the right direction. It would be a great pity, however, if the harmony of modern comedy acting were spoiled by this desire to shine, which eventually ends in over accentuation. It was not so when Mr. Fred Younge and Mr. Hare played minor characters in Mr. Robertson's comedies. If the Sergeant in "Ours," or Lord Ptarmigant in "Society," had gone beyond the line that marks perfect consistency and finish, what would have become of these celebrated comedies. But to atone for this venial fault, we have a clever and painstaking Mabel Vane in Miss Calhoun, and a promising actress in Miss Maud Williamson, who plays Kitty Clive. The mounting of the old play is beautiful in the extreme, and makes one long to have lived in London in the days of David Garrick. What a comfortable, courteous, and homely age it seems to have been—an age of tapestry, easy-chairs, old port, and well-roasted haunches of venison! Even cross-grained old Quin melted before the prospect of clever society and an honest dinner.

There was a little play produced at a Gaiety matinée last week called "A Fair Sinner," by Mr. Appleton (business manager for the vigorous and graceful lecturer, Miss Young), that should have interested the managers who are on the look-out for rising actors and actresses. Of the play itself, not very much, I fear, can be said, though I very much doubt if the author intended to convey the impression he did. A young lady who marries against her will to save her father from disgrace has been known before now to keep a very warm place in her heart for the man she loved from childhood, and was unable to marry; and it is not wholly unnatural that she should express some secret vexation when she sees the man, to whom she was originally engaged, betrothed to her best friend, and so cut off from her for ever. But these are secret motives to be kept hidden in real life, and are only serviceable for the analytical novelist—which, by-the-by, Mr. Appleton has the reputation of being. In a play they look coarse and crude, and the heroine of "A Fair Sinner," though possible in real life, and interesting in a novel, becomes on the stage unfeminine, and, as some may very properly think, immodest when she presses her affection on a man who is honourably anxious not to compromise her. But in Miss Minnie Bell, who plays the aforesaid "fair sinner," we have an actress of considerable intelligence and remarkable promise. She belongs to the school of nature. She gets under the character she represents. Her manner is bright and engaging, her comedy is finished in every detail, and, had she not been suffering with a very severe cold, I should say that her pathos would ring true, and from the heart. A Miss Benedict, a relative of the veteran composer, made also a very satisfactory début on this occasion, and promises to be a pretty and engaging actress; and so well has Miss Alexis Leighton acted in every character she has undertaken in London that it is astonishing she is seen so little on the stage. At the present moment, there is evidently no dearth of competent actresses. For absolute genius, every age has to wait. Mr. Giddens is, of course, one of the best comedians on the modern stage; but both Mr. J. A. Rosier and Mr. Macdona are far better actors than one often meets at established theatres and in most London companies.

Easter promises to be a very busy time this year; for, in addition to the melodrama of the realistic school by Mr. G. R. Sims at the Adelphi, we are to have a new funny play by Mr. Pinero at the Court, and a welcome revival of "The Queen's Shilling" and "A Quiet Rubber" at the St. James's, showing both Mr. W. H. Kendal and Mr. John Hare to the very best advantage. C. S.

Mr. Charles Bertram, who has been "commanded" six times before the Prince and Princess of Wales, announces a season of magic and conjuring at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, commencing on Monday next.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

SECOND NOTICE.

No incident of the magazine literature of the month will be more acceptable to the reading public than Mrs. Ritchie's (Miss Thackeray's) return to the walks of fiction in Macmillan's Magazine. Her hand has lost none of its delicate cunning in "Mrs. Dymond." Pretty are the scenes in London, where the treasures of the National Gallery are displayed to the young bride by her somewhat elderly husband; pretty the pictures of fishing and boating in the country; while there is a background of sinister suggestiveness and preparation for possibly tragic issues. As Mrs. Dymond makes her entrée, the "Millionaire's Cousin" withdraws with some abruptness, but with due regard to poetical justice. The long-suffering millionaire is rewarded by the hand of the lady of his affections, and the priggish narrator is left out in the cold. With the exception of an elaborate review of Parkman's history of Wolfe's conquest of Canada, the other contributions are much slighter and shorter than usual, and wear the appearance of having accumulated for a considerable time. The most important is Mr. G. P. Macdonell's review of Blackstone's character as a jurist and legislator. Mr. Morley's monthly summary of the political situation is as able as usual, and distinguished by an unwonted impartiality and patriotic feeling.

Mr. Black's "White Heather," in Longmans' Magazine, displays his usual mastery over Highland scenery and character. Some of the little descriptive passages are perfect cabinet pictures. "Little Joe Gander," by Mrs. Baring-Gould, is an affecting tale of the suffering of youthful genius at the hands people not ill-meaning, but coarse of mind and hard of heart. There is an interesting sketch of the life and death of a gifted but an unequal actor, G. V. Brooke. "Hoisting the Union Jack in New Guinea," gives much curious information respecting the manners and customs of our new subjects or protégés in that island.

The memoirs of George Eliot will hardly elicit any more adequate notice than Lord Acton's in the Nineteenth Century, a performance exhibiting erudition only comparable to Macaulay's, but supported without Macaulay's visible effort, and a style not indeed very highly finished but, in allusive suggestiveness, recalling Cardinal Newman or Mark Pattison's, while the writer's breadth of view and impartiality are worthy of George Eliot herself. We may and do differ from Lord Acton in some particular views, but recognise in him a width of sympathy and elevation of spirit which utterly refuse to be cramped by formulas like George Eliot's other critics, Mr. Hutton and Mr. Harrison. Another most important contribution is General Hamley's essay on the Volunteers, showing what tremendous power is wanted for want of what would be to this country a very small sum of money. Sir W. H. Gregory, who lately had the honour of being Arabi Pasha's keeper, thinks his captive would be the right sort of man to negotiate with the Mahdi and show England the way out of Egypt. The Earl of Darnley discusses Mr. Salt's criticisms on the management of Eton with general approval. It might not be amiss for those directly interested in the subject to refer back to a similar discussion in or about 1832, and inquire how far the abuses then denounced remain uncorrected. Prince Kropotkin gives an interesting account of the revival of national sentiment in Finland; but the advice he offers the Finns might have been thought to have proceeded from a Russian police agent, seeking a pretext for suspending the Finnish Constitution.

Once a Month, an Australian magazine, has the merit of savouring of the soil. Everything is really indigenous, from an interesting sketch of the Premier of New South Wales to a description of Christmas in the bush and a rough, hearty ballad on sheep-shearing.

The fictions in Temple Bar are less interesting than usual this month; and the magazine chiefly relies on two papers which appeal more than is quite seemly to the sentiment of mere curiosity about notorieties. The late eccentric Duke of Brunswick may be regarded as public property; but Adelina Patti has not forfeited all claim to privacy.

"Babylon," in Belgravia, fully maintains "Cecil Power's" character for brightness and cleverness. The marine painting in Mr. Clark Russell's tale of the sea is excellent, but the story itself is not interesting. "The Elixir of Death" is a tale of the terrible, greatly overdone. "Outwitted" is a pretty little Italian story.

Miss O'Hanlon's story in the Gentleman's Magazine, "The Unforeseen," promises to prove a powerful novel. The best of the other contributions are biographical—a very fair review of George Eliot's life and work, by Mr. Fox Bourne, and a remarkably interesting lecture on the late Sir William Siemens, by Mr. W. L. Carpenter.

Time has a very full and suggestive notice, by Mr. William Sharpe, of Pater's "Marius, the Epicurean," one of those romances, like "John Inglesant," in which the writer has embodied the results of years of study and meditation. The curate must be dauntless indeed for whom the ideal propounded in "The Clergy as Pioneers of Culture" has no terrors.

The Red Dragon has, as usual, papers of special interest to the Principality, including a notice of the Welsh poetess, Katherine Philips; and an account of the burlesque French invasion of Pembrokeshire in the Revolutionary War. Aunt Judy is remarkable for a contribution by Mr. Anstey.

The principal serials of the enterprising firm of Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co., besides The Magazine of Art (briefly noticed in our last Issue), are—Cassell's Magazine, The Quiver, Cassell's Saturday Journal, Greater London, Royal Shakspere, Familiar Wild Flowers, Book of Health, Old and New London, Illustrated Universal History, Popular Gardening, Picturesque Europe, Picturesque America, the Life and Words of Christ, by the Rev. Cunninghum Geikie; Little Folks' Magazine, Cassell's Popular Educator, and the first part of Our Own Country.

Among Fashion Books received are—Le Follet, The Season, Ladies' Treasury, Ladies' Gazette of Fashion, World of Fashion, Moniteur de la Mode, and Myra's Journal of Dress and Fashion.

ADRIAN VIDAL.

BY W. E. NORRIS,

AUTHOR OF "MDLLE. DE MERSAC," "MATRIMONY," "THIRLBY HALL," &C.

CHAPTER XVII.

AN AWKWARD ENCOUNTER.

To be the author of a novel which for a few months is in everybody's hands is, after all, no great matter. Very many persons have accomplished that much and have continued in a state of social obscurity from which it has occurred to nobody to drag them. But Adrian Vidal, having certain special circumstances in his favour, neither desired nor was suffered to remain obscure. When the east winds of spring were blowing clouds of smoke from the city and of dust along Piccadilly; when the black trees in the London squares were beginning to show touches of green here and there; and when people who had daughters to present were coming up for the first Drawing-rooms of the season, this fortunate young writer found himself so much in request that he could hardly have been made more of if he had been a successful general or a popular actor. He assured Clare, laughingly, that he never before had any conception of the number of people that there were in London, or of the quantity of entertainments that they gave. He did not weary of dinners and compliments, and it must be owned that he could swallow a large share of both without risk of indigestion. The stereotyped phrases; the smiling countenances which were so curiously like one another; the letters from unknown correspondents, which probably every novelist receives, and which begin with, "Dear Sir,—Although personally a stranger to you, I cannot resist," &c.; all these things were a delight to him. He estimated them neither above nor below their proper value, but took them for just what they were worth—evidences that he had given pleasure to a certain number of his fellow-creatures; that he had amused, and had not bored them. And that, when all has been said upon the subject that can be said, remains the chief aim of fiction. Vidal was satisfied with his attainment of it. He felt that he owed a debt of gratitude to a world which had brought him so much happiness and which he so sincerely loved. To have partly discharged that debt by the exercise of the humble talents with which the gods had gifted him was surely something. And being in this mood of universal benevolence, it was only in the nature of things that he should find his good-will reflected back upon him; so that, for the time being, he wended his way along a flowery path, thinking no evil and fearing none.

But, alas! What is one man's meat is another man's poison, and the bricks and mortar which are so dear to some of us are mere prison walls to others. In the full swing of excitements that to her were no longer exciting, in the heated, scented atmosphere of ball-rooms, and amid the ceaseless chatter of tongues and clatter of knives and forks, Clare was pining for the Cornish moors, and for a breath of the pure salt air that sweeps over them from the Atlantic. Trite modes of speech did not come to her easily; she had not acquired the art of conversation as it is understood by those who have few interests in common; glad as she was that her husband should be appreciated, the perpetual eulogy of his work ended by palling upon her. Thus, although Mrs. Vidal's beauty was undeniable, it was pretty generally agreed that there was not much in her. That, under these circumstances, she should have been a good deal left to herself was not surprising, and gave her little concern. What did cause her something like an incipient heartache was the fear which she could not always stifle, that Adrian was slowly but surely drifting away from her. To all outward appearance, he was as fond of her as he had ever been; she had nothing to complain of in the way of words or looks. But had not that subtle inward change already set in?—that change which none can welcome and none resist—the change from the love of the lover to the love of the husband. She was afraid of it; she did not know how to arrest it; she grudged the long hours spent away from home, and the solitude à deux which he seemed to regret so little.

One evening she was at a crowded party, looking pale and languid, and longing for Adrian to give her his customary signal to retreat, when, among the strange faces that surrounded her, there suddenly appeared one which brought a faint tinge of colour into her own. She had not seen Mr. Wilbraham since he had parted from her on the quay at Lucerne; her final rejection of his offer had been conveyed by post, and had elicited only a brief reply, in which the writer had expressed himself with something of the formality of one who suspects that he has been supplanted. With that he had passed out of her thoughts and, as she supposed, out of her life for ever. But now here he was standing before her, and for a moment she hesitated whether to greet him or not. It was only for a moment. Reflecting that this might probably be but the first of many such encounters, and that it would be very stupid to create an awkwardness at the outset, she advanced a step or two, holding out her hand and saying: "How do you do, Mr. Wilbraham? I am so glad to meet you again."

Wilbraham started, and looked at her fixedly. He was a tall well-built man with a healthy red-brown complexion, and did not bear the appearance of being consumed by a hopeless passion. "I don't know that I am glad," he answered, gravely.

However, he took her hand, and then, as she retreated towards the sofa from which she had just risen, he followed her and seated himself in the vacant place by her side. There was an uncomfortable pause of a few seconds; after which Wilbraham said: "I didn't mean to be rude, Mrs. Vidal; but if I was, perhaps you will forgive me. Some people can suffer in silence: I can't. So after this I shan't often speak to you, and you will understand why."

Clare began to wish that she had contented herself with bowing to her former admirer. "I was very sorry," she murmured, not knowing well what to say.

"Oh, you couldn't help it. It was my misfortune, but nobody's fault. We won't talk about that. They are making a lion of your husband, I hear."

"Almost too much of a lion," answered Clare, with a laugh and a sigh. "I don't care for such constant racketing about; although of course I am glad to think that his book has succeeded beyond our utmost hopes. Have you read it?"

"Yes; I read it," replied Wilbraham, with a certain hesitation. His manner said so clearly, "And I didn't like it," that Clara rather indignantly asked, "Why didn't you like it?"

"I did—in a way. I thought it a capital story, and very well written—only I wish he hadn't put you into it."

"Put me into it? I don't understand you," said Clare.

Wilbraham stared. "Do you mean to tell me that you don't recognise yourself in the heroine? Why, it is you to the life!"

"I am sure you are mistaken," answered Clare. "The heroine is a thousand times too good for me, and I don't think it would ever have struck Adrian to take me as his model. But if he had, I should have been very much flattered. It would have been a great compliment."

"Ah, well; perhaps so," said Wilbraham. "I am prejudiced, I suppose; but to me there is something unpleasant in the idea of setting up a picture of your wife for the public to gape at. That is the worst of authors and artists. They lead a sort of double life, and in most cases, I think, the public half of it engrosses them more than the private. Everything that they see and hear, and everything that happens to them, is so much material to be worked up for future sale. I doubt whether their wives are often happy women."

Clare was ready to pardon a good deal in Mr. Wilbraham, to whom she was conscious that she had not behaved over and above well; but this speech seemed to her to border upon impertinence, and it was with an air of cold surprise that she answered, "I assure you I am perfectly happy."

It was on the tip of her companion's tongue to retort, "You don't look so;" but he forbore. All that he said, after a short interval of silence, was: "You see, Mrs. Vidal, it doesn't do for me to talk to you. I can't keep my lips from evil-speaking. If I were magnanimous, I should congratulate you and say something pretty about your husband; but I suppose I am not magnanimous. Honestly, I don't like your husband; though I don't know him. And I don't want to know him."

It was at this opportune juncture that Vidal approached the sofa upon which his wife was seated. He had recognised, not without some inward amusement, the broad shoulders which he had first seen from the window of his bed-room at Lucerne, and which had caused him to pass a bad five minutes there. He was glad to see that no ill-feeling existed between Clare and her rejected suitor; and so far was he from suspecting that gentleman's uncompromising hostility to himself that he had strolled up for the express purpose of obtaining an introduction to him.

After what Wilbraham had said, Clare was not very willing to perform this ceremony; but when the two men were standing side by side she could hardly help making them known to one another, and she did so accordingly. Adrian bowed and half held out his hand, but withdrew it on perceiving that the other made no corresponding motion. He did not, however, imagine that Wilbraham intended to be unfriendly.

"We have met before," he said, pleasantly, "though only for a moment. You were at Lucerne last year, you know, and so was I; but I think you didn't stay more than one night."

"I heard afterwards that you had been there," answered Mr. Wilbraham, stiffly; "I didn't see you at the time. I think I must be moving on now, Mrs. Vidal; it's getting late. Good-night." He shook hands with Clare, favoured her husband with a nod and a grunt, and made his way towards the door.

"Your friend may have many sterling qualities, but his manners are not prepossessing," remarked Adrian, with a laugh, when he and his wife were at home again.

Clare was lying back in a low arm-chair, her cheek supported by her hand. She glanced up, half apprehensively, at her husband, who was refreshing himself with a cooling drink after the fatigues of the evening. "He was rather grumpy," she said; "but you know, dear, you couldn't expect him to take very kindly to you just at first, could you?"

Vidal threw up his eyes and his hands. "Oh, the vanity of these women! Do you suppose, madam, that that hale and hearty Philistine is pining away because you wouldn't marry him? Do you think, pray, that after this long interval of time, he is still in love with you?"

"I know he is," replied Clare quietly, "because he told me so."

"He did, did he? Upon my word, you are a nice young woman! May I ask whether this is the sort of discourse that you are in the habit of listening to when you retire so modestly into the background at evening parties? One more illusion gone! I shall never believe in the pristine innocence of Cornwall again."

"Oh, Adrian!" exclaimed Clare, in a low voice.

Her face was shaded by her hand. He stooped down, laughing, to look at it and saw, to his amazement, that her lips were quivering, and that two big tears were ready to fall from her eyelashes. "Why, my dear child," he cried, "what is the matter? You can't think that I meant anything more than the most harmless of small jokes! As if I wouldn't trust you with a thousand Wilbrahams! Good Heavens! Clare, what absurd notion have you got into your head?"

He was sorry that he should unwittingly have distressed her: but he was also just a little bit provoked. To the male mind nothing is more incomprehensible than those sudden, causeless bursts of emotion in which women find relief for feelings of which we have no experience. A man doesn't, as a rule, shed tears unless he has something to cry about.

Clare made no reply, but when her husband bent over her and kissed her on the forehead, she placed her hands upon his shoulders and forced him gently down on to a footstool beside her. Then she threw her arms round his neck and began to weep hysterically. "It's very silly, I know," she sobbed out; "but I can't help it—I am so tired! Adrian, I want to ask you something—it was something Mr. Wilbraham said—and I am sure he didn't think it would hurt me—but he was talking about your book, and he said—he said the heroine was like me."

Adrian could not help laughing a little. "I am afraid I must plead guilty to having occasionally thought the same thing myself," he answered. "My heroine was intended to be as near perfection as possible, and I suppose that is why I have sometimes compared her to you in my mind. Was that an offence?"

"Oh, no; only he said—and I remember having heard that before—that authors live as much in their books as in real life; and perhaps—perhaps in the long run they get to care about the books most. The people in the books don't worry them; they don't make fools of themselves, and cry about nothing; when they are bores they can be put away on the shelf"—Clare broke off, straightened herself a little in her chair, and looked into her husband's face. "I don't want to lose you!" she exclaimed, piteously.

Well, certainly this was rather ridiculous. If your wife is to begin being jealous of fictitious personages, where is she likely to stop? "Really, Clare," remonstrated Adrian, "you are not reasonable. What do you wish me to do? To give up writing novels altogether?"

"No, no!" she answered, drying her eyes; "of course not. I know I am not reasonable, and I can't say what I wish. Don't mind me."

"Come!" said Adrian; "there is something more than this upon your mind, only you won't speak it out, because you are a little goose." He put his arm round her and drew her head down upon his shoulder. "Tell me all about it," he whispered.

But Clare could not tell him all about it just at once. It was only by degrees and with some incoherence that she confessed her various troubles—her wish that they could be more together, her dread of the allurements of society, and so forth. "Sometimes horrid thoughts come into my mind," she murmured, "and I can't drive them away. You know so much more of the world than I do; and—and what your mother said at Brighton"——

"What did my mother say?" interrupted Adrian, with a shade of sternness in his voice.

"Nothing that I ought to have given a second thought to. It was only about your having had some flirtations before you were married. I suppose all men have flirtations. But she said that, as it happened so often, it was sure to happen again."

The young man rose to his feet, and took a turn or two up and down the room. He was thinking how thankful he ought to be to Heaven for having given him so amiable and considerate a mother. It also occurred to him that a little more trust on the part of his wife would not have been amiss. "Clare," he said, gently, at length, "don't you think it will be time enough to distress yourself and me when I have given you some cause to do so?"

The justice of this plea was not to be denied. Clare admitted herself in the wrong, and begged forgiveness. "Please, Adrian, don't think any more about what I said," she entreated. "I will never do it again, if I can help it. I shouldn't have done it now, if I had been myself; but I am not well."

In truth, she was not well; and there were reasons for this with which Adrian was acquainted—reasons which were doubtless sufficient to account for a little fancifulness and also to render over-fatigue an undesirable thing for the patient. After that evening, Mrs. Vidal went no more into society, the doctor having advised fresh air and early hours. Adrian offered to refuse all invitations for the future; but perhaps he was not very sorry that his wife would not hear of his making such a sacrifice.

"It wouldn't be a sacrifice," he said; "but I am not sure that I should be quite wise to let myself be forgotten. These people are my public, you see, and I want to stand well with them. Great novelists—men who appeal to the passions and emotions that are common to all humanity—can afford to snap their fingers at the fashionable world. They are always sure of a hearing. But it isn't so with me; or at any rate, if it has been so in the case of one novel, it is not likely to be so again. I can't hope to be found permanently interesting outside a certain circle; and within the limits of that circle I shall be ten times more read if I go about and show myself than I should be if I were never seen."

Fortified by this reasoning, in which it must be admitted that there was a germ of truth, Mr. Vidal continued to be a welcome guest at the houses of the rich and great, and his wife did not vex him with any repetition of the painful and uncalled-for scene which has just been described. In the afternoons he generally took her out for a walk or a drive; in the mornings he worked hard, and often, when he came in late at night, he would sit up for an hour or two, correcting and revising what he had written. He had composed his article for the first number of the Anglo-Saxon, which was just about to appear, and had been blandly congratulated upon it by the editor of that journal. The hurry and stress of his life, which to many men would have been simply unendurable, suited him exactly. He throve under it both in health and spirits; he would have not have changed places with the most wealthy of his entertainers; in short, he was at this time so perfectly prosperous and happy that, if he had been of a superstitious turn, he might have feared that some misfortune was in store for him.

By way of proof that the lot of no mortal is wholly exempt from care, a rather disagreeable thing happened to him, late one afternoon as he was leaving his club. Someone who had seen him enter that establishment a quarter of an hour before, and had loitered patiently up and down Pall-mall until he came out again, followed him as he hurried towards the St. James's Park station of the underground railway, by which he was in the habit of returning homewards, and caught him up just after he had passed Marlborough House. She was a handsome stoutish woman, with large black eyes and a fresh complexion. Her appearance was hardly that of a lady, although at a first glance she might almost have passed as one, for she was well and quietly dressed, and only certain deficiences about the extremities would have betrayed her to one of her own sex. Her voice, too, when she addressed the object of her pursuit, was the voice of an educated person, harsh though it sounded at that particular moment.

"I've a word or two to say to you," was her greeting, uttered somewhat imperiously, and she accompanied it by a smart tap upon Adrian's arm which caused him to start and wheel round at once.

"Susan!" he exclaimed; and his tone expressed more astonishment than delight.

"Susan it is," replied the woman with the black eyes. "Susan Bowman, at your service, Mr. Adrian Vidal."

"Still Susan Bowman?" he asked, endeavouring to speak pleasantly.

"Still Susan Bowman, and likely to remain so—thanks to you."

Vidal stroked his moustache and looked furtively up and down the Mall. He perceived that this interview was going to be a stormy one, and he had no wish to be accosted by any of his acquaintances while it lasted. "I am rather in a hurry," he remarked; "still, if you really have anything particular to say to me, Susan"——

Susan nodded her head emphatically to signify that she had. "Well, then, we may as well go into the Park and sit down. We can't talk very comfortably here."

"As you please," returned the other. "I'm not ashamed to be seen by anybody; but I dare say you are. You've reason enough to feel ashamed of yourself, any way."

Vidal did not defend himself against this accusation. He led the way silently into St. James's Park, sought out as sequestered a bench as could be found there, and when his companion was seated beside him, took up a conciliatory tone. "Now, Susan, I hope there is no reason why you and I should not talk together for a few minutes without quarrelling. I am sorry you think that I ought to be ashamed of myself"——

"Don't you think so?" interrupted the woman, quietly.

"Yes," answered Adrian, after a moment of consideration. "One ought always to be ashamed of having been a fool, and I certainly made a great fool of myself about you. But I suppose that is not what you mean."

"Not exactly. What I mean is that, if you had any shame in you, you would be ashamed of having ruined a poor girl who trusted you too well."

"That is nonsense," returned Adrian, rather sharply, "and you know it. What is the use of saying such things?"

"Did you swear to me, over and over again, that you loved me?" demanded the woman.

"Yes; I'm afraid I did," answered Adrian, with a retrospective shudder which he would have done more wisely to repress.

"Did you promise to marry me?"

"Oh, yes."

"And did you go back from your word and desert me?"

"I admit it all, Susan; I have never denied it. But that is not what is generally meant by ruining a girl."

"Isn't it, indeed?" retorted Susan, with a short laugh. "In my rank of life, we think ourselves pretty well ruined when our character is taken away; and your mother turned me out of doors without a character. That was nothing to you, of course. You got rid of me, and it wasn't worth while to inquire whether I starved, or what became of me. A lady's-maid who is silly enough to believe in the honour of a gentleman deserves all that she gets. Isn't that so?"

Adrian's conscience smote him. He knew that this woman had been nothing but a schemer, and that he, when a raw lad, had only been saved from becoming her dupe by Heriot's intervention. To say that he had deceived and deserted her was so misleading a statement of the truth as to be virtually false; but it was quite true that he had never troubled himself to ask or think about what her fate was likely to be, after she had been removed from his path; and this, now that he came to reflect upon it, did not seem to have been altogether creditable conduct.

"Well, you know, Susan," he said, "I acted as I was advised to act. It was thought better that I should break off all communication with you. I never supposed that my mother had refused to give you a character."

"I dare say she'd have told you, if you'd asked her," observed Susan, curtly. "As for acting as you were advised, I wouldn't boast of that, if I were you. Why didn't you take advice before you made love to me?"

Now, it was undoubtedly Susan who had initiated the love-making; but Adrian did not care to urge this or other pleas that might have been brought forward in his defence. "Let it be agreed that I behaved ill about the whole business," he said, a little impatiently. "I presume you haven't sought me out after all these years to reproach me with what is done and can't be undone. It would be more to the purpose to tell me whether I can be of any assistance to you in the present."

"Oh, I'm not in want of five shillings, thank you," answered Susan, with a harsh laugh. "I've supported myself up to now without your help, and I shouldn't wonder if I managed to go on. 'All these years,' indeed!—do you know what I've been doing all these years? Why, I've been educating myself to be fit to be your wife. Yes, I didn't give up hope; because, you see, I didn't know that your word counted for nothing. When we parted, you were too young to fight against your mother and your friends—Mr. Heriot showed me that plainly enough. I don't bear any malice against him; he treated me fairly, and helped me with money out of his own pocket; and it wasn't to be expected that he should wish you to marry a lady's-maid. But I thought to myself that things would be different some day. I've always been a little above the class that I was born into, and I knew that by the time you were able to think about marrying, I could make myself into as good a lady as any of them. And so——What are you laughing at?" she asked, interrupting herself, and fixing a pair of angry black eyes upon Adrian's face.

"I was not laughing," he said.

"You lie!" shouted the woman, with a sudden outbreak of ferocity. "I saw you laugh."

For a moment she looked very much as if she might be about to produce a knife or a revolver; but this mood left her as abruptly as it had come, and she went on in her former ironical tone: "Well, it was a curious notion for such a low-born creature to delude herself with; but I have been taken for a lady before now, all the same. I was in a situation as nursery-governess not so long ago."

"How on earth did you contrive that?" asked Adrian.

"Never you mind; that doesn't concern you. I didn't keep the situation long; but I gave it up of my own free will, and I'm a lady's-maid again now, because I prefer it. I've had my ups and downs, and more than once I've been nearer the workhouse than I liked; but I kept a good heart through it all, till I heard of your marriage." She paused a moment, and then added in a lower voice: "I heard it too late, or I'd have stopped it."

"It is absurd to talk like that," said Adrian. "You must know perfectly well that you couldn't have stopped it."

"Couldn't I? I should have tried, anyhow. You sit there, with your nose in the air, looking at me as if I were a beggar; but you can't have forgotten what we were to each other once. Do you remember holding me in your arms and kissing me and calling me your darling? Do you remember swearing that you would stick to me through thick and thin? Do you remember that?"

Well, he did remember it; and a most unpleasant recollection it was. He stole a glance at the handsome face beside him, which had once been more youthful, but which must always have been coarse, and the sense of shame and self-disgust which made him tingle all over was not of the kind that Susan desired to arouse in him. How Adrian, who was fastidious and refined in his tastes, had ever fallen in love with this dreadful person is one of those mysteries of human nature into which there is no occasion to pry too closely; but he had been in love with her, and he could not help being angry with her for reminding him of the fact in so very plain-spoken a way.

"I don't want to talk about that time," he said. "I was young and foolish then, and I did a great many things that I had better have left undone. Fortunately for both you and me, I was prevented from carrying my folly to the pitch of insanity. You can hardly imagine that we should have been happy as husband and wife?"

"But you see, that is just what I do imagine," returned Susan. "I know I wasn't fit for you in those days; but I've read and studied to make myself fit for you, and I'm no fool. You would have been as happy with me as with the woman you've married. By all accounts, she hasn't got much to show for herself beyond a pretty face."

"Now, look here, Susan," said Adrian, "I have listened to you patiently so far, but I don't care to have your opinion about my wife. Leave her alone, please, and tell me what you want of me."

"Want of you?" repeated Susan, looking away, and seeming to speak more to herself than to her questioner. "Ah, I can't say. I don't know exactly what I wanted of you when I followed you just now. But," she added, turning upon him with a rather unpleasant smile, "there's such a thing as revenge, Mr. Vidal; and I shouldn't mind paying you out for what you've made me suffer. Perhaps your wife isn't aware that you were once engaged to be married to one Susan Bowman. Ah, she isn't!—I thought not. Well, supposing I were to walk up to Alexandra-gardens, where you live, some fine morning, and tell her the whole of that pretty story? How should you like that?"

"I shouldn't like it at all," answered Adrian, candidly. "It would cause both her and me annoyance, and would do you no good in the world that I can see."

"I want to cause you annoyance," returned Susan, placidly; "and that's why I shall be at your house in Alexandra-gardens before I'm much older."

Now, there was a very simple and obvious way of taking all the sting out of this menace; but, unfortunately, Vidal could not bring himself to adopt it. Knowing how easily Clare's jealousy was aroused, and remembering what her state of health was, he felt that it would never do to tell her now what, possibly, he ought to have told her before. It would, of course, be highly illogical on her part to hold herself personally aggrieved by any faults or follies that he might have committed years before he had ever seen her; but the art of just reasoning is not a feminine attribute, and Clare had lately shown herself somewhat remarkably devoid of it. Moreover, at the bottom of his heart there lurked a strong disinclination to confess that he had once been eager to link himself for life to a domestic servant. Taking everything into consideration, therefore, it seemed to him the best plan to offer Susan all the money he had about him to leave him in peace.

He did this with as much delicacy as the case admitted of, and, rather to his surprise, Susan accepted his bribe at once. "You must be very much afraid of your wife" was her sole comment upon the transfer of eight pounds ten shillings from Adrian's pocket to her own.

"I am afraid of giving her pain," answered Adrian, briefly. "And now I must wish you good-night," he added, getting up. "It is a pity you didn't tell me at the outset that you needed money; for I would very gladly have given you what I could afford, without being threatened. I am not a rich man; but I have always thought that something ought to have been done for you, and I hope that if you are ever in want again, you will let me know. You had better address your letter to my club. Good-night, Susan, and good-bye. I trust it won't be very long before you meet some good fellow in your own—that is, some one much better suited to be your husband than I could ever have been."

He hastened towards the railway station, feeling greatly relieved and somewhat tickled by this commonplace termination to an interview which had at one time seemed likely to enter upon a tragic phase. He might have been less easy in his mind, had he known that Susan, when left alone, stood for full five minutes on the little bridge in St. James's Park, debating whether she should drop his money into the water or not. That she finally decided to keep it, proved nothing, except a proper dislike on her part of wanton waste.

"So you think eight pound ten and a few civil insults payment enough for the likes of me, do you?" she muttered, as she resumed her walk. "Very well! But I'll be even with you yet, my gentleman. Thank you for showing me how to set about it."

THE BLENHEIM RAPHAEL.

We are able to present to our readers an Engraving of the most famous of the Blenheim pictures, recently purchased for the National Gallery. Raphael's "Madonna degli Ansidei," as it is generally called, was painted at the very height of the artist's career, and marks the moment (probably about 1505) when, separating himself from those who were content to act as mere followers of Perugino, he gave the reins to his own genius. The picture has very clear and uneventful history. It was painted (probably at Florence) for the chapel of the Ansidei family, in the Servites' Church, at Perugia; where it remained undisturbed until 1764—a time which probably coincides with the utmost neglect of the fine arts in Italy. No other cause can be assigned to its sale at that time to Mr. Garvin Hamilton, who was then collecting pictures in various parts of the Continent for Lord Spencer. On his Lordship's death his collection was divided between his representatives at Althorpe and Blenheim, the Raphael falling to the ducal branch of the family.

The two figures on either side of the Virgin are those of St. John, represented as a man of full age, and St. Nicholas of Bavi, in Pontifical robes, holding a crozier. The figure of the Virgin is one of remarkable beauty, rich in colour, and simple in treatment. Behind the canopy is a landscape recalling the scenery of the Tuscan hills, amongst which Raphael was then living. The coral necklace, or rosary, which hangs from the canopy, recalls a similar ornamentation introduced by Mantegna into his famous "Holy Family" at the Louvre.

At the onset of negotiations for the purchase of the Blenheim pictures, public attention, it will be recollected, was first stimulated by the rumour conveyed by telegraph that the German Government had purchased the whole collection for two millions of marks. This was subsequently denied, and the twelve most important works were offered to the National Gallery for 400,000 guineas, or a selection of five of them for 165,000 guineas. After many months of correspondence and hesitation, the Duke of Marlborough, having obtained the consent of the Court of Chancery, agreed to sell the "Ansidei" Raphael for £70,000, and the equestrian portrait of Charles I., by Vandyck, for £17,500; and at these prices they have become the property of the nation.

Mrs. Anna M. Longshore Potts, M.D., an American lady, who has recently been lecturing in London on medical subjects, gave on Tuesday evening, in St. James's Hall, a lecture on "Love, Courtship, and Marriage." NEWS FROM NICE.—With the exception of a very few wet and cold days, the weather is again splendid. Not a flake of snow has fallen. The sun shines almost perpetually, and the influence of its warm rays makes life enjoyable to all, and more especially to those who have by impaired health sought its influence.
There are no epidemics, and the average mortality of the city in 1884 was less per mille than London and many fashionable towns in England.
The streets, roads, and sewers are constantly cleansed and disinfected, and watered from the mountain stream of the Vesubie. There are three English doctors and physicians in practice here—viz., Messrs. West, Wakefield, and Sturge, and they will be happy to communicate with any intending visitors as to the healthfulness of the town.
The effects of the recent storm (the like of which has been unknown for thirty-five years) were completely lasting, and repaired in twenty-four hours. In some few low-lying rooms and cellars, near the Fish Market, the wash from the spent waves had entered, but this was soon pumped out by the firemen and military.

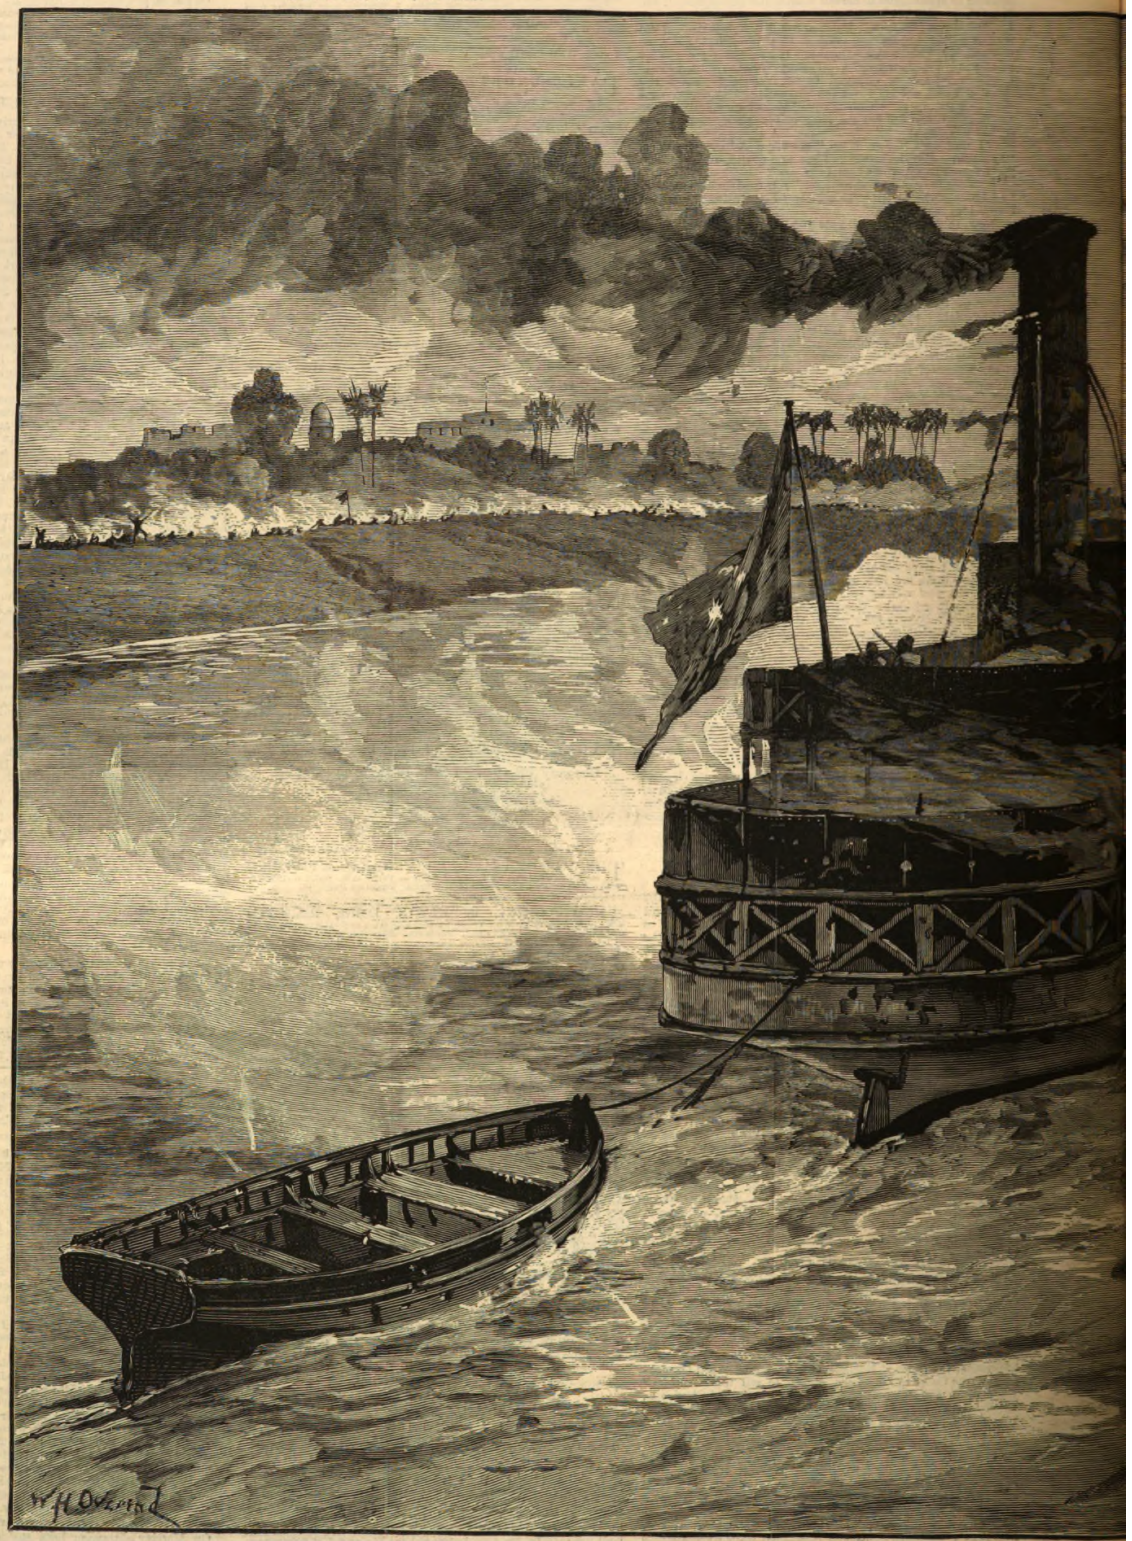
THE BATTLE OF ABOU KRU.

The Daily Telegraph of Saturday, March 7, states:—"The vivid and exact account of the battle of Abou Kru by our Special Correspondent, Mr. Burleigh, which, with its companion-piece of the battle of Abou Klea, has excited such universal admiration, finds this week a most remarkable pictorial comment in the elaborate Sketch by Mr. Melton Prior, published in the Illustrated London News. The four-page drawing there printed may be considered a triumph at once of the artist and of the engraver, so far as the rapid fidelity of the former and the skilful execution of the latter are concerned. The public may here look on war, as it has never been seen before by stayers at home, especially with Mr. Burleigh's letter for their guide. There is the thin mobile square, with its fringe of darting flame; the swarming enemy, the patient camels, the busy guns, the slender defence of bushes, boxes, and saddles, and inside the weak fortalice the dead laid in rows, the wounded limping to the rude hospitals, the brave and kindly surgeons ministering as calmly as if Death did not hover over every head, in the midst of all; with sorely-injured men suppressing their agony; and amidst all the turmoil and danger of the scene, the gallant General stretched with his death-wound, and listening with pallid but dauntless countenance for the news of victory. This engraving is a notable specimen of the good work which is done nowadays by the artistic as well as the literary historians of our distant campaigns, and a great proof of the talent and cool observant powers of Mr. Melton Prior."



On Monday afternoon both the Oxford and Cambridge University boat crews arrived on the Thames, and commenced their usual practice.

Dr. Sylvanus P. Thompson, of University College, Bristol, has been appointed Principal and Professor of Physics at the Finsbury Technical College.

The Right Hon. W. E. Forster presided at the annual dinner and conversazione of the Newsvendors' Benevolent and Provident Institution, held at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on Wednesday.

13 Castles	P to Q B 4th
14. P to Q B 3rd	R to Kt sq

Down to this point, the moves are "book" on both sides. White now makes a departure which does not seem to us to be an improvement.

15. Kt to Q R 3rd

15. P to Q Kt 3rd is the usual and, as we think, the preferable move.

15.	P takes P

Obviously the correct reply.

16. Kt to Q Kt 5th	R takes Kt

Readiness to seize an advantage is eminently characteristic of M. Tschigorin's style. White is now thrown on the defensive throughout the game.

17. B takes R	Q to Kt 3rd
18. P to Q R 4th	P to Q 6th (dis. ch)
19. K to R sq	P to Q R 3rd
20. Kt to B 4th

The only move to save the piece.

20.	Kt takes Kt
21. B takes Kt	P to K Kt 5th
22. P to R 5th	Q to R 2nd
23. Q to R 4th

There is nothing better.

23.	B to K 7th
24. R to K sq	Kt to K 5th
25. P to K R 3rd	Q to B 7th

Black plays with admirable precision, and every blow tells.

26. B to Q 2nd	B to B 4th
27. B takes P (ch)

Futile; but White is in the toils.

27.	R takes B
28. Q to K 8th (ch)	K to R 2nd
29. Q takes R	Q to Kt 6th, and White cannot avoid Checkmate.

On Wednesday, the 25th inst., the Oxford Club will play a match against a team of the 1st. George's Club, probably the third class; and, on the following day, the annual match of the Universities will be played at the St. George's Club, Albemarle-street. On Saturday, the 28th, the University teams will again unite to play a match against Brighton, eight a side, at the City of London Club, Newgate-street.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, March 10.

At last the Chamber has finished the discussion of the Cereals Bill. On Thursday the whole law was voted by 264 votes against 150. The committee appointed in the Senate to examine the bill consists of nine members, all of whom are favourable to the tax on imported grain, and some demand even the elevation of that tax to four or five francs the hectolitre instead of three francs, as proposed by the bill. M. De Soubeyran interpellated the Government last Saturday on the imperfection of the present monetary circulation and the depreciation of silver. The Minister of Finance admitted that the present state of affairs is unsatisfactory, but did not consider it prudent to provoke a new monetary conference. He promised, however, to consult the delegates of the Latin Union, who will meet next month. The discussion by the Deputies of the Budget of 1885, as amended by the Senate, led to a discussion of the right of the Upper Chamber to modify the dispositions of the Deputies in matters of finance. Finally, the theory of mutual concessions prevailed, and the Chamber, by 302 against 191, decided to discuss the amendments of the Senate.

The Exhibition Committee has finally adopted the Champ de Mars as the site for the forthcoming International Exhibition, and fixed the cost of the building at two millions sterling.

In view of the forthcoming general elections, it may be interesting to note a sort of alliance between the reactionaries of all shades with a view to taking advantage of Universal Suffrage. A new journal, La Flandre, contains manifestos from the Bonapartist Cassagnac and the Monarchist Hervé, which sum up the doctrines of a sort of "Conservative anarchy": destroy the Republic, and then we shall see what is to be done. It is pleasing to remark that a coup d'état or coup de force is considered to be out of the question. The adversaries of the Republic put their trust, some in a miracle, others in the effects of union, and, out of all their efforts, the probability is that absolutely nothing will result.

One of the most brilliant manifestations of modern art which has been seen in Paris for many years is the exhibition of the works of Eugène Delacroix, now open in the Ecole des Beaux-Arts. Born in 1798, Delacroix reached the prime of his talent at the moment when Victor Hugo and the Romantic school were revolutionising French poetry and art, and he became as a painter what Hugo became as a poet—that is to say, a great Revolutionary leader and a great dramatist. Delacroix passionately loved passion, and all his life he sought the best means of expressing passion by line and colour. But how little had the present generation seen of his work! "The Ceiling of the Gallery of Apollo," "The Wreck of the Don Juan," "The Massacre of Scio," and "The Jewish Marriage," in the Louvre; two frescoes in the Church of Saint Sulpice, "The Entrance of the Crusaders in Constantinople," lost in the historical labyrinths of Versailles—half a dozen works were alone accessible to our admiration. In the present exhibition, there are two hundred and fifty pictures, and as many drawings and studies: we are able to judge Delacroix on the strength of a large proportion of his life's work. Well, the exhibition is a revelation to us, and a triumph for the artist. Delacroix died in 1863; he now comes before the tribunal of posterity; and posterity declares him to be one of the great geniuses of the French school, and worthy to take his place beside Lebrun and Poussin. Delacroix ought to be particularly interesting to us Anglo-Saxons, for his masters in painting were Bonington, Constable, Wilkie, and Copley Fielding; and it was in the works of Shakspeare, Scott, and Byron that he found the inspiration of some of his finest pictures. Delacroix's series of lithographs illustrating "Hamlet" and "Macbeth" are splendid, both in conception and in execution. But while admiring the masterpieces gathered together at the Ecole des Beaux-Arts—the "Convulsionnaires de Tanger," "The Two Foscari," "Medea Killing Her Children," the "Massacre of the Bishop of Liége" (from Scott's "Quentin Durward"), "Boissy d'Anglais," "The Crusaders," "The Battle of Nancy," "The Prisoner of Chillon," "Sardanapalus," and all the marvellous paintings of animals, landscape, and sea—we are struck with the immensity of the artist's labour, the minuteness of his researches in all the details of his art, the indefatigable pursuit of mastery of his instruments. We have only to look at the quantities of drawings and studies, the masses of sketch-books and note-books, exhibited in glass cases, to realise how completely Delacroix's life was absorbed by his art. It was he who said to a young artist who had asked advice and counsel, "If you are not expert enough to sketch a man in the time he takes to fall from a fifth-floor window to the ground, you will never be able to produce great works." In this enormous hyperbole we find the preoccupation of Delacroix's whole life, the attainment of a rapidity and sureness of execution which would enable him to fix the images formed by his marvellous imagination without allowing any of the intensity of the action or of the idea to evaporate. The proceeds of the exhibition at the Ecole des Beaux-Arts are to be devoted to erecting a bronze statute to the memory of this great painter.

Telegrams from Madeira state that the Germans have hauled down the British flag at Victoria, situated at the head of Ambas Bay, in the Little Cameroons, and have raised the German flag in its stead. This act, we trust, will turn out to be only the unauthorised excess of some too zealous officer.

We learn from Calcutta that the Indian Government have made arrangements for the reception of the Ameer of Afghanistan with due pomp. Lord Dufferin will be accompanied by most of the higher officials, and it is expected that the meeting will take place on the 28th inst.

THE BECHUANALAND EXPEDITION.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Julius M. Price, a volunteer of "Methuen's Horse," who is one of the party attached to the Telegraph Company of the Royal Engineers in advance of Sir Charles Warren's expedition to restore order in Bechuanaland, sends us the Sketches published this week. They were taken while at the camp formed near Barkly, on the Vaal river, in Griqualand West, before advancing into the border country which has recently been made the subject of political controversy; and which is a narrow strip of land, the abode of the Batlapin and Barolong tribes, under their chiefs Mankoroane and Montsioa, but their tribal rule is disputed by rival native chiefs; amongst whom some hundreds of Boers and other white men have lately intruded, occupying farms by pretended grants from the hostile native party. We now learn that Sir Charles Warren has established military rule at Vryburg, in the district of Stellaland, which is the southern part of Bechuanaland, nearest to the Cape Colony. Mr. Krüger, the President of the Transvaal Republic, had returned to Pretoria after his conference with Sir Charles Warren; and it is believed that the Transvaal Government is acting in co-operation with the British Commissioner, but much excitement prevails among the Boers. The Boer frontier camp at Rooi Grond, adjacent to Goshen and to Montsioa's country, is now deserted. Until Sir Charles Warren reaches that place, where it is hoped that he will exercise his authority without opposition, there is still much uncertainty whether existing disputes can be adjusted by a pacific arrangement.

The Sketches presented in this Number of our Journal represent scenes and incidents of camp life, which must be new to many of the volunteers who went out from England last November, having enlisted in the "South African Irregular Field Force," in the regiment of Mounted Infantry commanded by Colonel the Hon. Paul Methuen, popularly called "Methuen's Horse." Another Mounted Infantry regiment, which was raised in the colony, is similarly known by the name of its commanding officer as "Carrington's Horse." The force under Major-General Sir Charles Warren, R.E., includes also some regiments of the Queen's army, the Inniskilling Dragoons, a detachment of the Royal Artillery with Gardner guns, and a battalion of the 1st (Royal Scots) regiment of infantry; there is, besides, a local corps of volunteers from the Diamond-Fields of West Griqualand. The camp at Barkly West, towards the end of January, was thus a place of military bustle; and our Special Artist has delineated the scene at the arrival of the first detachment of "Methuen's Horse," which he had preceded some days before; the baggage-waggon seen in the distance is one belonging to the Royal Scots regiment. The row of horses picketed in a line, undergoing the process of grooming, is humorously called "the stables." The full-length portrait of an officer of "Methuen's Horse" is an example of the campaigning costume; and their rough accommodation is shown in the blanket tents occupied by Colonel Cotton and Captain Drummond, with saddles, guns, portmanteaus, and waterproof sheets lying about on the ground; and in one of the "tentes d'abri" belonging to the officers of Carrington's regiment. As January in South Africa is Midsummer, the heat is intensely felt, and there is much natural thirst, which is the excuse for putting "Drink" into these Sketches. "The Torture of Tantalus" is realised by an unhappy sentry, who sees his comrades with a bottle relieving their necessity, but may not partake of the cooling draught.

ROYAL NATIONAL LIFE-BOAT INSTITUTION.

A meeting of this institution was held on Thursday, the 5th inst., at its house, John-street, Adelphi, at which rewards amounting to £203 were granted to the crews of life-boats of the institution and shore-boats for saving life from wrecks on our coasts. Payments amounting to £2977 were made on various life-boat establishments. Among the contributions lately received were £1000 from Mrs. J. H. Macdonald towards the endowment of her life-boat at Appledore. It was decided to send a new life-boat, possessing all the latest improvements, to Blackpool, in lieu of the boat at present on that station.

The annual meeting of the institution will be held at Willis's Rooms next Saturday—the Duke of Northumberland, president of the institution, in the chair.

Mr. Lionel Monckton presided at the piano.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

"If I were an English Minister," exclaimed Prince Bismarck on the 2nd of March in the memorable speech in which he roundly rated Earl Granville for hindering the development of German colonies, and plainly recommended co-operation with the Sultan as the best way of safeguarding English interests in Egypt. In directness of speech, the German Chancellor is certainly more English than the present Foreign Secretary of England; and Prince Bismarck's plain speaking will not have been in vain if it should have the desirable effect of curing that vagueness of speech, which, there is reason to fear, has but represented indecision of judgment and indolence of action on the part of Earl Granville. The perfect courtesy of the noble Earl's reply on the 6th inst. in the House of Lords to Prince Bismarck's late complaint, on the other hand, exhibited the urbane Foreign Secretary at his best. He referred to Prince Bismarck's former blunt counsel to England to "take Egypt" as an open secret, and protested that, in referring to it, he had not the faintest idea of attacking the Chancellor, whose closing friendly sentiments he quite reciprocated. Though a new source of dispute appeared to be imminent when the report came on Monday that the Germans had hauled down the British flag at Victoria, in Ambas Bay, West Africa (near the Cameroons, where German sailors have had hot work), the satisfactory answer returned by Lord Granville on Tuesday to the Marquis of Salisbury "that our negotiations with Germany on Colonial matters are at present on a very friendly footing" reassured alarmists. Any differences that may have existed between the German Chancellor and the Foreign Office are now supposed to have been removed by the successful mission to London of Count Herbert Von Bismarck, who has been even named as a possible forthcoming Ambassador of Germany to the Court of St. James's.

Life in the House of Commons has been, on the whole, dull since the Censure Debate. Mr. Gladstone's firm but pacific note on the 5th inst. in speaking hopefully of the issue of the Anglo-Russian negotiations allayed the fears of a collision on the Afghan frontier, where Sir Peter Lumsden had been kept waiting an unconscionably long time for the leisurable Russian representative.

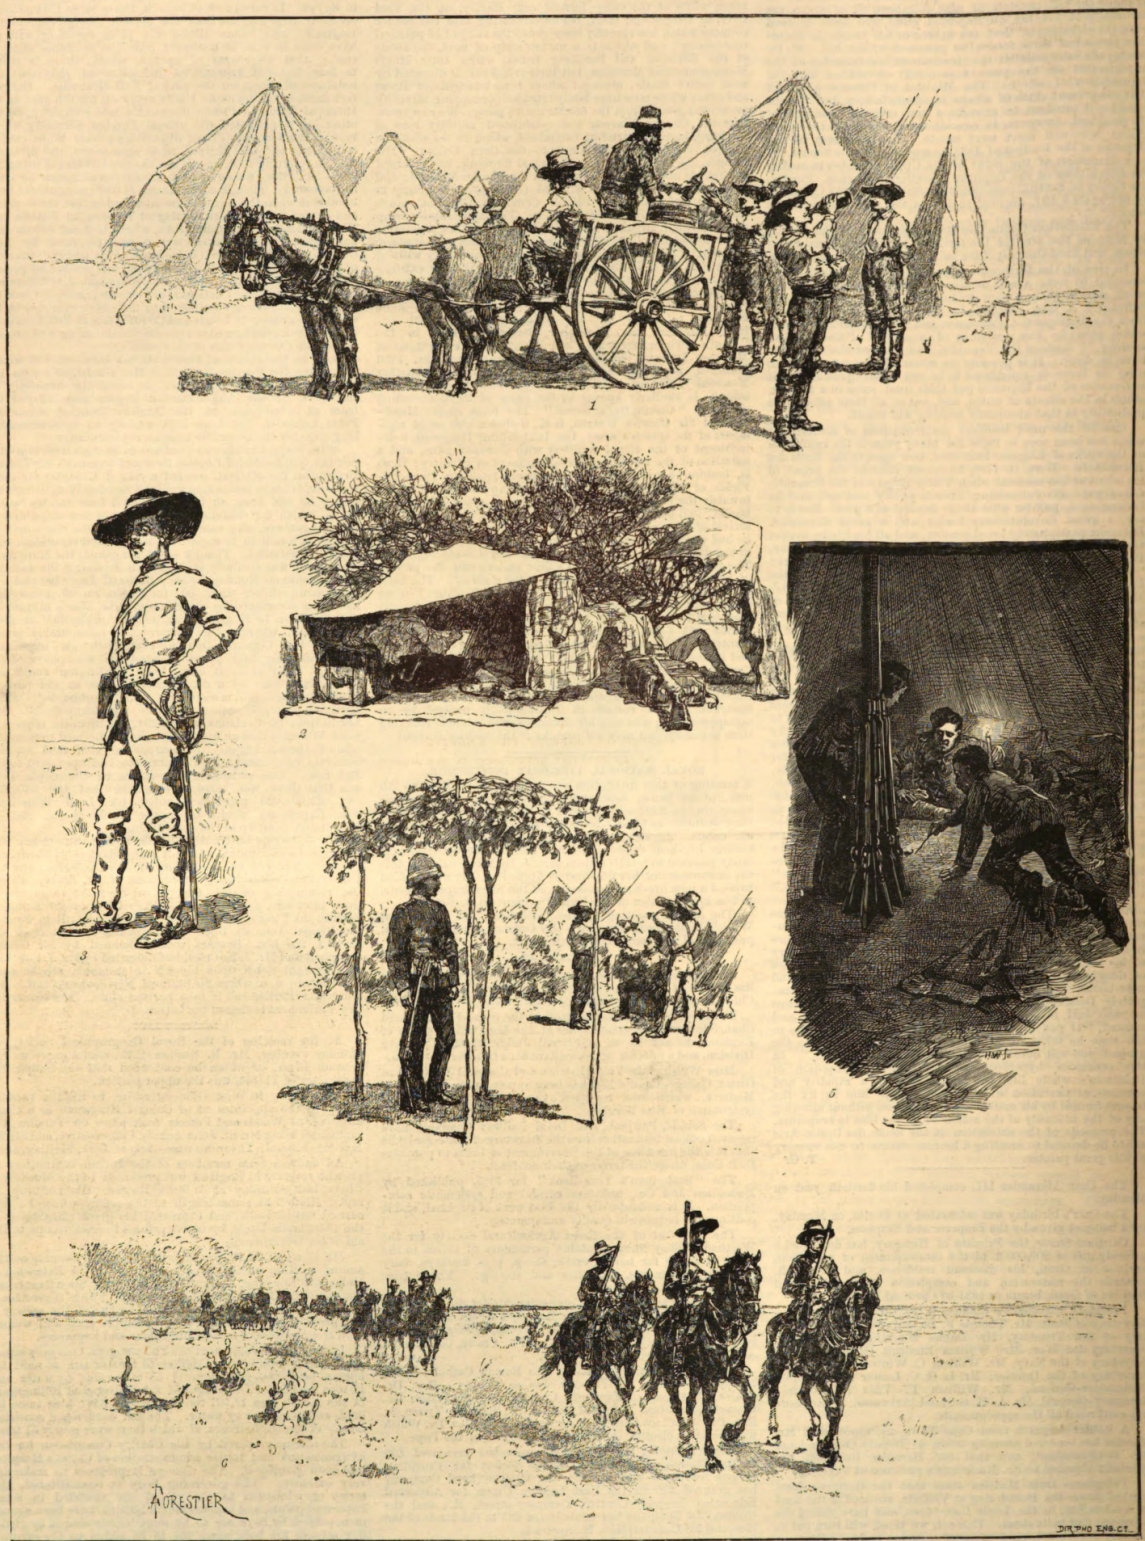
With respect to the sinews of war in another direction—the Soudan quicksand for English lives and treasure—Sir Thomas Brassey on the 5th inst. secured a vote of £330,000 for extra naval expenses in connection with the Soudan War, though not before he had been, so to speak, raked fore and aft by Mr. W. H. Smith for delaying the building of new ships, and by Mr. Labouchere, who vainly sought to reduce the vote by a quarter of a million to sustain his well-earned reputation as a Radical economist. Though divided against, the Marquis of Hartington was similarly successful in obtaining the sanction of the House on Monday for the additional Army Estimates of close upon a million—£942,000—for the Soudan. Some astonishment was occasioned by the Secretary for War's allusion to an expedition to Khartoum as being "probable" at some future day, whereas the Government indisputably stated during the Censure Debate that such an expedition would certainly take place to overcome the power of the Mahdi. Be that as it may, Lord Hartington could not be induced, even by a direct interrogation on the part of Lord E. Cecil, to retract the word "probable," which Radicals promptly construed into "problematical." His Lordship based his claims for the £942,000 upon the request of Lord Wolseley that an expedition should be sent to Souakim against Osman Digna. In compliance with that request, General Graham and some 12,000 troops had been sent to the Red Sea. One satisfactory assurance by the noble Lord was that there was reason to believe that the £300,000 and £1,000,000 previously voted for Lord Wolseley's Nile Expedition would cover the whole of the cost of that undertaking up to the present time.

The Commons have not made much progress in Committee with the Redistribution of Seats Bill, albeit short shrift was given the Minority amendment of Sir John Lubbock, and the Universities disfranchising amendment of Mr. Bryce. Before the resumption of the debate on Tuesday, there was a lively interlude, due to Sir H. Maxwell's suddenly rising to censure the Viceroy of India for pressing forward in Council the Bengal Tenancy Bill. This irregular proceeding on the part of the hon. Baronet was condemned by Sir George Campbell and Mr. J. K. Cross, but defended by Mr. J. Lowther, who brought down upon himself an animated rebuke from Mr. Gladstone, to whom Sir Stafford Northcote replied. But altogether Parliament is in a parlous state. The sooner the new Parliament is elected the better.

At the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society on Monday evening, Mr. R. Gordon, C.E., read a paper on the Irawadi River, of which he contended that the Sanpo, the great river of Thibet, was the upper portion.

The polling in West Gloucestershire, to fill the vacancy caused by the appointment of Colonel Kingscote as a Commissioner of Woods and Forests, took place on Tuesday, the candidates being Mr. St. John Ackers, Conservative, and Sir W. Marling, Liberal. The result was—Ackers, 4837; Marling, 4426.

An address from members of the Indian community at present residing in England was presented to the Marquis of Ripon last Saturday at Willis's Rooms. His Lordship, in reply, alluded at some length to the policy which he had carried out in India, and expressed his great satisfaction at the offers made lately by native princes to send troops to the aid of the Government.



Mr. Goschen, M.P., presiding last Saturday evening at the annual meeting of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching, congratulated that body upon its success, but maintained that the public support which it receives is totally inadequate to its objects. The aim of the society is not professional advantage, but to supply men and women with fresh sources of mental brightness and happiness.

Last month the officers of the Fishmongers' Company seized at and near Billingsgate Market 66 tons of fish as unfit for human food. Of this quantity 55 tons came by water and 11 tons by land. The weight of fish delivered at Billingsgate in the month was 11,907 tons, of which 8491 tons came by land, and 3416 tons by water. The fish condemned consisted mostly of foreign herrings, of which there were nearly 51 tons.

The scheme prepared by the Charity Commission for the reorganisation and future administration of Christ's Hospital has been published. The changes it proposes to make are very extensive. The governing body is reconstituted, the terms of admission to the school are modified in some important points, and benefits which hitherto have been almost monopolised by boys are to be more largely shared by girls; day schools for both sexes are to be added to the existing foundations; and Christ's Hospital itself is to be removed from its present site, and is to be placed and maintained within a convenient distance from the city of London. A boarding school is to be provided within a convenient distance from the city of London for 500 girls, and a day school not more than three miles from the Royal Exchange for a further 400. At the boys' boarding school there are to be 700 places, and at their day school 600.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

We are favoured by Colonel Sir Charles Wilson, through our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, with the opportunity of publishing two Sketches of the greatest interest; the one being that of his celebrated reconnaissance of Khartoum on Jan. 28, and the conflict of his steamboats with the enemy's fort at Omdurman and with thousands of the Mahdi's soldiery on Tuti island and on the opposite bank of the Nile; the other Sketch representing his party, after the wreck of their vessel on Jan. 31, landed on the small islet of Mernat, from which situation they were relieved on the following day by Lord Charles Beresford, with his steamer manned by the British sailors, who went up from Gubat, bravely encountered a heavy fire of the enemy from the river-banks, and brought them safely home to the British camp. These incidents were among the most adventurous and remarkable of the late campaign, and we are fortunate in being enabled, by the assistance of the gallant officer then in command, to include them in the subjects of our pictorial record. It will be remembered that Sir Charles Wilson started up the river from Gubat, on Saturday, the 24th, with two of General Gordon's steamers, the Bordein and the Tal Howeiya. With these vessels, despite great obstacles from the rapids and rocks in the unknown stream, he reached the junction of the Blue and White Nile, at Omdurman, early on the following Wednesday, and passed along the shore of Tuti island, where the enemy were collected in great force, keeping up an incessant fire of rifles, with several guns in the fort and batteries. He approached within eight hundred yards of the town of Khartoum, so as clearly to see its principal buildings, the Palace or Government House, the Mosque, and the Catholic Church, but soon obtained the sorrowful knowledge that Khartoum had fallen, and was already in the possession of the enemy, the garrison having surrendered on the previous day. As nothing could be done with the small force under his command, having a mere escort of British soldiers of the Sussex Regiment and about two hundred Egyptian or Soudanese of Gordon's troops on board the steamers, Sir Charles Wilson was obliged to return, again running past the enemy's forts and batteries, assailed by an incessant fire. The Tal Howeiya was wrecked at Gebel Royan. The wreck of the second steamer, on its way down to Gubat, appears to have been preconcerted with the enemy, as large numbers of them were assembled at that place; but Sir Charles managed to land his party safely, with four guns and the ammunition, and to hold his position on Mernat island, day and night, till he saw Lord Charles Beresford's vessel engaged with a battery erected by the enemy three miles below. A round shot pierced the boiler, and it was necessary to stop for repairs, which were executed by the chief engineer, Mr. Henry Benbow, under fire of the battery, within a range of five hundred yards; all honour to the Naval Brigade! Seeing what had happened down the river, Sir Charles Wilson crossed with his party to the right bank, and marched down to meet Lord Charles Beresford; he re-embarked there, and was conveyed to Gubat, arriving at three o'clock in the morning of the next day. Lieutenant Stuart-Wortley, who had been with him at Khartoum, had already returned to Gubat in a rowing-boat, and had brought the sad news of the fall of Khartoum.

PRINCE HASSAN, BROTHER OF THE KHEDIVE,
HIGH COMMISSIONER OF THE EGYPTIAN GOVERNMENT IN THE SOUDAN.

Another Sketch by the late Lieut.-Colonel R. C. Coveny, of the 42nd Royal Highlanders, who was killed on Feb. 10 in the battle of General Earle's column at Kerbekan, is presented in this week's publication. It is that of the General and his Staff at the landing-place at Hamdab, above the Gerendid cataract, on their route up the Nile.

The news of present military operations is of very little interest. The remainder of Sir Redvers Buller's column, including the Heavy Division of the Camel Corps, the Artillery, and the Naval Brigade, arrived last Sunday from Gakdul at the head-quarters, which are still at Korti; and General Brackenbury, with the Staffordshire Regiment, the Highlanders, and the Engineers, has also returned thither.

At Souakim, where Sir Gerald Graham would arrive this week from Cairo to take the command, the Guards have already disembarked after their voyage from England, and some of the Indian troops have landed. They expect an early battle with Osman Digna.

We present a Portrait of the Khedive's younger brother, Prince Hassan, who joins Lord Wolseley's head-quarters with the titular office of High Commissioner for the Egyptian Government in the Soudan, and is in command of a regiment of Egyptian cavalry. He was educated partly in England, and has been at Oxford and at Woolwich. The Portrait is from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: GENERAL EARLE'S LANDING-PLACE AT HAMDAB, ON THE NILE.
SKETCH BY THE LATE LIEUTENANT-COLONEL R. C. COVENY, 42ND (BLACK WATCH) ROYAL HIGHLANDERS.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, March 11.

A large amount of gold has arrived this week from Germany and other parts of the Continent, thus adding to our financial strength, while it has at the same time so excited the apprehensions of the directors of the Bank of Germany, that they have raised the official rate to 5 per cent, after two years of 4 per cent, and in spite of low rates in the open market. It is almost expected that the Bank of France will advance to-morrow. Politics have much to do with this desire to remain strong in the matter of gold. Our rate is still 4, and it is working to perfection. As a people, we have investments all over the world, and it is our custom to reinvest each year not only the income derived from such investments, but such further sums as our current savings suggest. The fear of war, or other cause of distrust, induces us to delay investing, and then flows into us the income accruing from many parts. We are in that position now; and, in raising the rates, foreign banks strive to tempt us to leave our money with them by offering greater inducements. Germany is particularly anxious to check this return of money to England, because her market is in danger of suffering a serious crisis, for it is notorious that speculators in Berlin are up to their neck in Russian bonds; while it is clear that a conflict in Afghanistan would probably send such bonds down 10 or 20 per cent in a very few weeks.

In the Stock Markets, the tone has for several days past been more assured, chiefly because, as regards Egypt and Germany, the outlook is better; and, as to Russia in Afghanistan, there is a general desire by the principals and their allies to prevent an appeal to arms. But a most serious crisis has come upon certain notoriously speculative securities. It began with the Grand Trunk Railway dividend proving to be not more than 1½ per cent per annum on the first preference. A fall of 15 per cent at once took place in that stock, with a corresponding reduction in the other classes. The extent of this movement caused a panic among several groups of speculators, and some other similarly sustained securities have also seriously declined, London, Chatham, and Dover issues more especially.

Dealings in Turkish Government stocks have lately been on the basis of the groups agreed upon at the settlement of the debt in January, 1882, when it was decided that, apart from those loans the interest payments of which were specially secured, all the debt should rank without distinction for interest; but that, in repayment of the principal, some regard should be had to priority. For this purpose the debt was divided into four groups—the first comprising the 6 per cent stocks of 1858 and 1862; the second, the 6 per cent issues of 1860 and 1863-4, and 9 per cent Treasury bonds; the third, the 6 per cent loans of 1865, 1869, and 1873; and the fourth, the 5 per cent general debt bonds, the bulk of which was issued in 1865. It is worth remarking that the market quotations of the groups have been steadily advancing, partly because the interest due this week has been provided.

In continuation of their policy to make all the Indian railways State lines, official notice has been given to the Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Company that the Government of India will exercise their right to purchase the undertaking this year, under the terms of their contract. A proposal for a new lease is to be, however, applied for, should the idea meet with the approval of the proprietors, which, however, is not quite certain, decided opposition to this course being expressed in several quarters. This will make the third large railway taken over by the Indian Government, the first having been the East Indian, and the second the Eastern Bengal. Unlike the two lines just referred to, the revenue of the Scinde Company has always been below the amount required to meet the guaranteed interest, the net amount, so far, advanced by the Government for this purpose being £6,506,293.

Holders of New Zealand Five per Cent Bonds are offered £107 of Four per Cent Bonds in exchange for each £100 Five per Cent stock; and as the Five per Cents may be paid off at par at the option of the Government, it seems that holders could not do better than convert.

Mr. J. S. Keltie has been unanimously elected librarian to the Royal Geographical Society, in succession to the late Mr. E. C. Rye. Mr. Keltie retains the editorship of the "Statesman's Year-Book."

An official notice appears in the Gazette conferring on the sisters of the present and grand-daughters of the late Marquis of Cholmondeley the title, place, and precedence which would have been due to them had their father succeeded to the title.

In London last week 2623 births and 1495 deaths were registered, the former having been 222 and the latter 300 below the average numbers in the corresponding weeks of the past ten years, allowing for increase of population. The deaths included 16 from smallpox, 52 from measles, 15 from scarlet fever, 15 from diphtheria, and 37 from whooping cough.

Convocation of Oxford on Tuesday carried the decree granting £500 a year for three years to Dr. Burdon Sanderson, the Professor of Physiology. The motion was resisted by Canon Liddon and the Bishop of Oxford, representing the anti-vivisection party, who were defeated by 412 votes against 244.

In the Divorce Court on Tuesday, Sir James Hannen gave his decision in the suit of the Earl of Durham for nullity of marriage, on the ground of his wife being insane when the marriage was contracted. Sir James went through the evidence in considerable detail, and said he saw no evidence that Lady Durham had been insane till a considerable time after her marriage. He therefore dismissed the petition with costs.

The first spring show of the Royal Horticultural Society took place on Tuesday afternoon at South Kensington. It was exceedingly interesting; cyclamens, cinerarias, orchids, and camellias engaging special attention. Besides the flowers and plants, there was a choice and numerous array of apples, the fruit looking as fresh as in autumn. The next exhibition will, it is expected, be rich in hyacinths and tulips.

A remarkably cheap "Illustrated Life of General Gordon," edited by "Philip," is issued this week from the office of The Penny Illustrated Paper, 10, Milford-lane, Strand. For twopence is presented a complete biography of the "Hero of Khartoum," illustrated by a profusion of drawings of Gordon's "Baptism of Fire" in the Crimea, Storming the Redan, his victorious campaign as "Chinese Gordon," his crusade against slavery while Governor of the Soudan, his last Mission to Khartoum (with View of the City), new Portraits of the General, Engraving of his Nile Warfare, Sketches of Gordon's Steamers, and of Sir Charles Wilson's View of Khartoum, together with excellent Portraits of the Mahdi and our "Soudan Heroes," including Lord Wolseley, Lord Charles Beresford, Sir Charles Wilson, Sir Redvers Buller, and the late General Earle, Colonel Burnaby, Colonel Coveny, Colonel Eyre, and Lord St. Vincent. Facsimiles of General Gordon's Arabic message and Khartoum bank-note add to the value of this extraordinary twopenny-worth, the sale of which is bound to be large. "The Illustrated Life of General Gordon," it may be added, is brought down to the fall of Khartoum, and is complete as a souvenir of one of England's great military leaders.

THE CHURCH.

The Bishop of Bedford presided on Monday at the annual meeting of the East London Nursing Society, which was held at the Mansion House. The report stated that in the eighteen East-End parishes in which the operations of the society are carried on, 37,6 cases had been nursed, involving 57,710 visits; 1626 of those nursed were women, and 492 children under 14. A resolution pledging the meeting to support the society was adopted.

Mr. Edmund Yates, who had been sentenced to four months' imprisonment as a first-class misdemeanant, for a libel that had appeared in the World newspaper, of which he is the proprietor, and who had served about half the period of his sentence in Holloway Jail, was released on Tuesday, by order of the Home Secretary, in consequence of injury to health.

The Royal Humane Society has conferred its silver medal on Mr. C. J. R. Le Mesurier, District Judge, for a gallant act performed in the Maramba Lake, Ceylon, whereby he saved the life of a native. The silver clasp (the recipient being already in possession of the silver medal) is awarded to Colonel Clare, V.C., R.E., for, with assistance, rescuing a gunner who fell off a pontoon bridge into the Roorkee Canal, India.

The annual return of the Volunteer corps of Great Britain for 1884 shows that the force on the authorised establishment has grown from 160,321 in 1860 to 249,419 in 1884. The number of efficients in 1884 was 208,365; non-efficients, 6650; number actually enrolled, 215,015. Of these, 18,147 had qualified for the special grant of 50s. There were actually present at inspection 184,282.

LATEST NEWS OF THE WAR IN EGYPT.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF THE

LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE

Relating to the SOUDAN EXPEDITION,

Including Despatches from Korti, Gakdul, Merawi, Souakim, and the Latest Intelligence from Khartoum.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE says of the heroic march to the Nile:—"The palm for description must be given to the Correspondent of the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE, whose despatch is not only much the longest, but also the most vivid in its colouring and realistic in its narrative."

THE ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE says of the dashing fight before Metammeh:—"Nothing seems to have escaped the attention of the Correspondent of the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE; and the whole story is told with a quiet and full particularity which—to use a very hackneyed phrase—leaves nothing to be desired."

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE of Feb. 1 complains of Lord Wolseley's "confused despatch" relating to General Stewart's "brilliant success"; and adds: "Among the press telegrams the next morning the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE'S was the only good one."

BOLTON EVENING NEWS:—"There is news this morning of a most startling character regarding events at the seat of war in the Soudan. The first authority for the information of the fall of Khartoum was the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE, which has been conspicuous for excellent accounts of recent battles in the Soudan."

PENNY ILLUSTRATED PAPER:—"A veteran War Correspondent, Mr. Charles Williams, won the Press laurel for his animated account of the battle of Metammeh, in Mr. Edward Lloyd's popular newspaper, the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE."

NEWPORT ECHO:—"All authorities are agreed that the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE takes the palm for its masterly description of the battle before Metammeh."

THE SPORTSMAN:—"Many people have been struck with the vivid pictures of events which succeeded Abou Klea, and which appeared in the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE."

THE DOVER STANDARD:—"A Compliment to Journalism.—The graphic accounts of the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE Correspondent with General Stewart's force have attracted great attention."

THE SURREY ADVERTISER AND COUNTY TIMES:—The battles of Abou Klea and of Gubat will, in the hands of some future Napier-like historian, fill a glorious page in British records. Fortunately, the story is at hand in the columns of description telegraphed by the Special Correspondents of our daily contemporaries, notably by that of the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE, which a consensus of opinion in press circles admits has shot at once to the front in its splendidly-written account of the last battle in which our little but gallant force under Stewart rolled back the tremendous onset of the Arabs."

NEWCASTLE DAILY JOURNAL:—"The telegrams of the fighting before Metammeh were throughout of the most brilliant character. The palm for description must this time be given to the Correspondent of the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE."

MANCHESTER DAILY NEWS:—"The most consecutive narrative appears in the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE from the pen of Mr. Charles Williams, and the descriptive touches in this long account are just what one might have expected from such a practised writer, whose telegrams go to the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE."

THE SPECTATOR:—"The Correspondent of the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE, whose telegrams are excellent, has a knack of getting them off in time."

PORTSMOUTH EVENING MAIL:—"The LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE has undoubtedly scored by its war correspondence. Its messages have been prompt, graphic, and reliable. Mr. C. Williams's descriptions of the principal engagements have at times been quite brilliant, and the greatest compliment which could be paid to their merit has been their reproduction, with due acknowledgments to Mr. Edward Lloyd's enterprise, in both the metropolitan and provincial press."

EAST KENT GAZETTE:—"The LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE has scored a distinct success with its war intelligence, and Mr. Charles Williams has proved the wisdom of the editor in selecting him to be his representative in the Soudan by the brilliant feats he has from time to time accomplished. Papers of all shades of opinion, such as the 'Pall Mall Gazette,' the 'St. James's Gazette,' the 'Spectator,' and others, with scores of provincial journals, have paid him the highest compliments possible, and his despatches are reprinted from one end of the kingdom to the other—I may even go so far as to say throughout the civilised world."

CITY PRESS:—"Very high praise is due to the correspondent of the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE (Mr. Williams, I believe) for description of the battle-scenes."

BELFAST NEWS LETTER:—"The most graphic and readable description of the military operations of General Stewart's army while fighting its way on towards Metammeh after leaving the wells at Abou Klea, is admitted all round to be that from the pen of Mr. Charles Williams, the Special Correspondent of the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE."

NEWCASTLE EVENING EXPRESS:—"The LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE was the only London paper that yesterday published the news of the fall of Khartoum, and it stated that the Government had received the news; but the War Office officials would give no information to the representatives of the press for hours afterwards."

STRAY SHOTS:—"Poor Cameron will not again flash his dashing messages to the 'Standard,' nor St. Leger Herbert wield his flowing pen for the benefit of the 'Morning Post'; yet while mourning the loss of these bold, intrepid men, we must all have noted the sudden appearance among this heroic little brotherhood of one, hitherto obscure, whose despatch on the recent battle is not only much the longest, but also the most vivid in its colouring and realistic in its narrative. I refer to the correspondent of the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE. All authorities are agreed that the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE takes the palm for its masterly description of the battle before Metammeh."

EVENING NEWS:—"It is impossible to read the brilliant description of the battle of Feb. 10 in the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE, which has again outstripped its competitors in the excellence of its account of the fighting. . . . Why, such sentences as these in the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE'S splendid telegram carry us back to the days—when there were men in England—to the days of the old Crimean War, of the Alma. . . . We ask in all seriousness if any Englishmen of common sense can read these vivid battle-pictures in the LONDON DAILY CHRONICLE and aver that the men who are thus gloriously making history for their country are not worthy of a better fate!"

THE

LOUIS VELVETEEN.

"LE FOLLET" says:—The LOUIS VELVETEEN has already rejoiced in a longer reign in the world of fashion than that of any material within our recollection; and when we take into consideration that it is equally suitable for all occasions—an advantage no other fabric possesses—and that, whether employed as a complete dress, portions of toilettes, or trimmings, it is as effective as it is serviceable, its favour is not surprising.

The Louis Velveteen, from its wonderful resemblance to the richest Silk Velvet, is essentially a lady's material; the lights and shadows, so thoroughly like those of Genoa and Lyons Velvet, the rich folds and graceful drapery, so soft and silky to the touch, all account easily for its great and permanent vogue among the aristocracy, both here and abroad.

Though very strong, it is so light in wear that even in elaborately made dresses, with long trains, it has no inconvenient weight; while from some peculiar and special arrangement of the pile, no amount of creasing will flatten or rub it; neither rain nor dust alter its rich colourings or dim the bloom for which it is so celebrated—advantages that cannot be too highly appreciated.

CRÊPE IMPÉRIAL, for Mourning Wear. It is all wool, and yet looks exactly like crêpe, as it has the peculiar or crimped surface on which is inseparable from that fabric. It is solid and most durable, being free from the elasticity of the more perishable silk crêpe, which it so closely resembles, and yet it is glossy. It is made up effectively into costumes for deep mourning, when it is not compulsory to trim with crêpe, and will wear as long as the mourner elects to use it.—Extract from "The Queen, the Lady's Newspaper."

WITH THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Sketches by our Special Artist, Mr. William Simpson.

MARUCHAK, ON THE MURGHAB RIVER.

KIBITKAS, OR TURKOMAN TENTS, IN THE CAMP OF THE BRITISH AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION AT BALA MURGHAB.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

(From our Special Artist, Mr. W. Simpson.)

Bala Murghab, Dec. 19, 1884.

After four days' rest at Kuhsan, which was necessary in many ways for making arrangements resulting from the junction of the two camps, Sir Peter Lumsden started on a visit to Penjdeh, on the Murghab. For this purpose, he took only a small part of the camp with him, leaving the heavy portion to go on slowly by way of Kushk and Kila Nau, towards the ground of the proposed winter quarters. With Sir Peter were Captain Barrow, A.D.C., Mr. A. Condie Stephen, Assistant Commissioner, Nawab Mirza Hassan Ali Khan, Major Holdich, R.E., of the Survey Department, Captains Durand and De Lassoe, Attachés, and Mohammed Aslam Khan as Native Attaché. Fifty men of the 11th Bengal Lancers formed the escort, under Captain Heath; Surgeon Charles went as the medical officer in charge. Through the favour of Sir Peter Lumsden, I had the advantage of being one of the party. The Kazi Saad-ud-din, as the Ameer of Afghanistan's representative, with a camp of his own, and an Afghan escort, accompanied Sir Peter Lumsden.

We left Kuhsan on Nov. 24, and the other portion of the camp were to leave on the 25th and 26th. Our march was over a plain which rose gently to the east and north, towards which our course lay. This plain I took to be only a continuation of the Dasht-i-Jam, already mentioned in a former letter as stretching away north-west, from the left bank of the Heri-Rud, in the direction of Meshed; the part of it on the right bank over which we marched extended from Kuhsan, on to the south-east towards Herat. Away far in the south could be seen a range with many well-defined peaks, called the Kuh-i-Doshak; while before us was another range of bare hills known as the Kuh-i-Siah Bubuk. The two ranges seemed to approach near to each other at a point which could not be very far distant from Herat. These ranges are the connecting links of the Elburz chain in Persia, with the Koh-i-Baba chain in Afghanistan. About ten or twelve miles from Kuhsan we reached a watershed, and on the eastern side of it were a few small undulations which might be called hills. Our camping ground was on the beginning of some slopes reaching up towards the Siah Bubuk. Here we found a spring of water, and in the early summer the spot would no doubt be green, thus explaining the name of Chesmeh Subz, which means "Green Spring."

Our next march was up the slope from our camp, and over a kotal, or pass, in the Siah Bubuk, called the Durrah Chesmeh Subz. The ascent was easy, but it was rocky and wild on the other side. The Siah Bubuk has rocky ridges along its summit; but its flanks are smoother on the north-east, and as they descend they become rounded masses. From the tops of some of these we got an extensive view away to the north, and could see there rounded hills getting lower and lower as they sank down towards the great plain of Central Asia, the plain itself not being visible. In the valleys we descended there were reeds and long grass, at this season all of them of a light amber colour, and so dry that a lucifer-match would produce a large conflagration. These reeds showed that there was water at some time of the year in those places. The peculiarity is that water appears in the hollows, but before it runs far it is absorbed; a mile or two further on it may appear again, and again it may sink into the ground. This is not peculiar to the mountain rivulets, but it also takes place with the rivers—the Heri-Rud at Sarakhs being an example, as well as the Kushk-Rud, which will shortly be described. It is an important military question as to the supply of water on the space between the Heri-Rud and the Murghab, to the north of our line of march. On our official maps, which are far from being correct, there are lines of routes and the names of places. We have no reliable information about them. Some suppose that they are only the paths which the Turkomans have followed in their raids, and that they alone know where to find water. When on a raid, they dig for it, and find enough for a few men, filling up the source when they leave. Others say that there is only water at certain seasons. This point is almost certain, that nowhere is there water sufficient for the supply of a large body of troops, and that a force of any size would require to keep either to the line of the Heri-Rud or the Murghab. This district between the Heri-Rud and the Murghab, and from Herat north to the Desert, has the name of Badghis. At our first camping ground, after crossing the Siah Bubuk, there was a very nice murmuring stream, which had its source only a short distance above us. It might be about 3 ft. or 4 ft. wide and a few inches deep; it was clear good water. This, I understood, disappeared farther down the valley. Sari Chesmeh, one of the names given to us of this place, means "The Head Spring." A village had stood here, but a long time ago, judging from the state of the ground.

Next day, the march to Kalabagh was over slopes farther removed than the march of yesterday was from the Siah Bubuk; and, as might be expected, they were lower. On our left we passed the Ziaret of Baba Foorkh; it stands on the high ridge of slope; below it, in the hollow, is a spring with some mulberry-trees—I mention these, as trees are so rare in this region, it might be described as "treeless." The ridges over which our march lay seemed at first to be quite out of the zone of cultivation; and the appearance of the ground would have confirmed this, but for the discovery of the remains of water channels. Before reaching Kalabagh, we found the indications of another underground water channel. There is no village at Kalabagh, but there are the mounds and ridges remaining of a considerable town.

From Kalabagh we had to cross three very considerable ridges to Tutichee, the whole route bare and without trees. The camping ground was close to a number of springs, from which a considerable stream of water flows.

Our next march, to Kara Tapa, on the Kushk-Rud, was a long one, as much as twenty-nine miles. The first half of the march was over the same bare, undulating ground we had been going over for the last day or two; and the last half was along a valley which terminated in the Kushk valley. We had seen game of some kind every morning—small deer principally. On this march we chanced to come upon a considerable variety. There were deer of various kinds, and the gurkal or wild ass. In the valley, which formed the latter part of our march, the ground was everywhere ploughed up by the wild boar. Five or six of these were come upon at one place, and some of our party attacked them with the lances of our escort. These instruments are not so sharp and penetrating as the pig-sticking spears used in India, and no impression could be made on the animals with them. The pigs were very large and strong, and they were not slow to turn and become the assailants. After about fifteen minutes of chasing and being chased, one of the pigs was shot. The great size of these animals was testified to by our party, who are all familiar with pigs and pig-sticking in India. More than one effort was made to bring away the dead pig, but his weight was too great for any of the means at hand.

The Kushk valley is formed of rounded hills such as we have passed through; they are said to be wholly formed of sand, with here and there a stratum of conglomerate running horizontally through them. There is a flat bottom of alluvial soil in the valley, which widens out in places to half a mile or more; this has been all under cultivation at one time, but has long lain fallow. The stream may be about twenty feet wide at Kara Tapa; the water is clear, so that fish can be seen—I noticed one about a foot long. The Turkomans have laid waste all this region, as they did that of the country bordering on the Heri-Rud; from this cause towns and villages have ceased to exist, and mounds only remain to mark the sites. About a century ago there was a large population in this valley. Kara Tapa is one of those large mounds which are peculiar to this part of the globe, which are to be found all over the desert of Central Asia. There is one at Merv. Geok Tepé, by its name, implies one—the word is spelled differently by map-makers. Tapa is here given as the form of the word used by the Indian Survey Department. From Sarakhs along the desert to the Caspian there are numbers of them, and in many cases the word "Tapa" will be found on the map as part of the name of the place. On the Kushk and Murghab Rivers we have seen some very remarkable Tapas, one of which is Kara Tapa, or the "Black Mound." I am now inclined to believe that these mounds are wholly artificial. Kara Tapa stands in the middle of the flat alluvial soil of the Kushk valley, and has the appearance of being wholly heaped up. It was estimated to be seventy or eighty yards across the top, the sides sloping down like a railway embankment to a wider diameter below, and about fifty feet high. There are the ruins of brick walls and towers of defence round the top, but there is nothing but rubbish within. These fortified works I suppose to belong to a very late date in comparison to that of the Tapa itself. The mud walls of some houses are close to the base of the mound; these must have been deserted for some years.

The march to Chaman-i-Bed was down the river, which here flows to the north, at first on the level ground of the valley; but a few miles below we struck into a narrow defile on the left among the rounded hills, and continued winding among them for about eight miles, when we again came out on the valley. This pass is called Chapgál, and it cuts off a long bend of the river. On coming out we found a fine wide space in the valley, with ploughs at work, and men digging out the old filled-up water-courses for irrigation. These men were Saroks from Penjdeh, and they were bringing this part of the ground into cultivation for the first time since the former population had left it. We crossed here to the right bank of the Kushk. A few miles below, and near to Chaman-i-Bed, on the east side of the valley, is another of the old Tapas; it is called Kara Tapa Kurd, or "Little Black Mound": the mass of earth heaped up in this case is small in comparison to the other. It is a square platform of earth, over 100 yards on each side, and about 25 ft. high. At the north-west corner there is a more elevated part, standing perhaps as high again as the main body of the mound, and about 20 yards square on the summit. This Tapa has not a vestige of a structure left on its summit; fragments of pottery and a few bits of brick are all that is visible. A very little cleaning up and it would be a beautiful lawn-tennis ground. Round it, more particularly on the south, are the very slight elevations of the ground left by the town which had at one time stood here. These old Tapas could be fortified for the defence of the valley; but unless the hills on each side which dominate them were also made defensive, the labour would be all but thrown away. Still, this may have to be done at some point or another, for the Kushk valley is on the direct route from Merv to Herat; and in the case of an advance to the south by Russia this line would be utilised, as well as the one from Sarakhs along the Heri-Rud.

Kala-i-Maur, our next camping ground after Chaman-i-Bed, is also an old Tapa, with the ruins of a mediæval brick fort on it. The mound is very large and irregular in form, and the town, of which the mounds remain, must also have been of considerable size. Judging by the remains, this must have been a very important place in its day. It stands on the left bank of the river, on slightly elevated ground, which is not closed in on the west, neither is it dominated by the hills around. Below Chaman-i-Bed, the Kushk disappears; for about fifteen miles we found no water, only the dry stony bed, which is filled up when there are rains. At Kala-i-Maur the water comes again to the surface.

It was at first arranged that we were to march from Kala-i-Maur to Ak Tapa in one day; but it was twenty-eight miles, so the march was divided into two, and we went on the first day to a place only nine miles away, and encamped on the right bank of the Kushk. Here we found water in the river, but on visiting Pul-i-Khisti, where the Kushk joins the Murghab, we found the bed of the river perfectly dry. As most of our march to Ak Tapa was away from the river, we had not the chance of noticing where the water disappeared. On our march down the Kushk, we found that the Saroks were occupying the valley towards its lower end, and were bringing it into cultivation. Villages were also springing up, and we found at the lower end of the valley a good number of men clearing out one of the larger irrigation canals. Crops had been raised last year in some parts. The men we saw above Chaman-i-Bed, as already stated, were ploughing for the first season.

On arriving at Ak Tapa, the Afghan garrison at that place was turned out, and stood in a long line on an elevated plateau of ground, which extended from the point where we turned out of the Kushk valley to about half a mile from Ak Tapa, a distance of about five or six miles. As we neared the line of troops, the officer commanding them, General Ghous-ud-din Khan, rode forward to receive Sir Peter Lumsden, and a salute of seventeen guns was fired. The Afghan troops were advanced to Ak Tapa a few months ago, on account of some movements of the Russians on the line of the Murghab about that time.

The official maps, it turns out, are very incorrect; that will be easily understood when it is remembered how few Europeans have visited this part of the world. Major Holdich, from his observations, finds that Penjdeh should be placed on the map 12 min. 30 sec. east and 5 min. 42 sec. north of where it is now represented; all the places round will have to be moved distances more or less the same. Maruchak has to be moved on the map east 25 min. 30 sec. and north 2 min. 9 sec.; Bala Murghab has also to be put east 13 min. 3 sec. and north 4 min. 30 sec. The minutes in these figures roughly represent miles. On the official map Ak Tapa is represented on the west of the Kushk river, whereas it is on the east. It is situated on a piece of flat alluvial ground, round which the Murghab passes in a winding course before it is joined by the Kushk. On the larger edition of the map, the bridge over the Kushk is rendered "Bridge of Boats," but the Persian name is Pul-i-Khisti, and not Kishti; this word means boat, but the word in its name should be rendered brick—hence it is the "Brick Bridge," which describes the material of which it is built. The bridge has nine arches, and from its appearance it probably belongs to about the same date as the Pul-i-Khatun on the Heri-Rud. It is much decayed, but is still serviceable; at some time it has been used to take the water of a large irrigation canal over the Kushk.

Ak Tapa is the largest of these old mounds we have yet seen. I think it is even larger than the one at Old Sarakhs. It is triangular in plan, and the top measures 300 yards in length by 150 about its widest part; add to this that its height is about 100 feet, and some idea may be formed of this huge mass of earth. The earth of which it is formed is of a lightish grey, and seen from a distance, when the sun shines, it appears to be white, and from that it gets its name of Ak, the Turkoman word for that colour. There are no remains of walls on it; only the fragments of earthenware usually seen upon old sites are visible. The earth has been thrown up to form a slight parapet round its crest by the Afghan troops, and a few embrasures for the guns have been made. There are a tent or two on the top for the guard, and the troops are encamped in tents below. The camp of the Afghan Boundary Commission was pitched on the left bank of the Murghab, at some distance on the south-east from the Tapa. Ak Tapa must have had a military value at one time, for it commands both the Murghab and Kushk valleys. There are hills on the east from which it could now be commanded by modern artillery. The place is still important: and, as it defends the two valleys, it may yet have to be made into a place of strength, in view of possible future contingencies. There has been a town at this locality also; for the large mounds are supposed to have been only citadels. On the plateau to the west the earth is full of bits of pottery.

We stopped a day at Ak Tapa, and then moved on to Penjdeh. About six miles to the south nearly the whole distance is covered with Sarok villages, formed of kibitkas. The Sarok Turkomans have come south from the Merv district, and have become Afghan subjects. The Murghab, as well as the Kushk valley, was without inhabitants, and its fields were lying waste. Some years ago the Saroks arrived, and they have restored the place to life again. Some of their chiefs came along the Kushk valley, and met Sir Peter Lumsden on the third march from Ak Tapa; crowds of the Saroks turned out to see our arrival, and the outskirts of the camp were generally fringed with them, eager to look at the Feringees, and watch what they doing. There was a good deal of trade going on in the purchase of carpets, and other articles, by our people. A considerable quantity of Indian rupees and Persian crans was left among them, so we may suppose that they will retain a pleasant recollection of us. At Penjdeh we remained two days; one of these days was principally occupied by a visit from the Governor of Herat, who had followed us up; and Sir Peter Lumsden paid a visit to Yalintoosh Khan, the chief of the Jamsheedies.

There are the ruins, little more than mounds, of an old fort, and the evident remains of a town around it; these also are nothing more than mounds, on the west side of the river. A man called it "Kona Pendie," by which he meant Old Penjdeh. If there is a new Penjdeh, we did not see it, unless it be the kibitka villages of the Saroks, and they extend for over twenty miles along both banks of the Murghab. We were scarcely prepared for such a large sized river as we found here. It is as wide as Regent-street, of considerable depth, with a large volume of bluish-grey water flowing steadily past. When towns of importance, equal to those we have traced the remains of, come into existence again on its banks, "penny boats" will be shooting along from pier to pier. Fords are very few, and the one we crossed at Maruchak had at least four feet of water in its deepest part. I heard some one estimate the breadth of the valley at Penjdeh as about four or five miles; whether this is exact or not, there is a large width of ground, which had been cultivated when the valley was prosperous and full of inhabitants. The mounds were the remains of large towns, and they are a sure evidence of the population that once existed and found subsistence on the banks fertilised by the waters of the Murghab.

The march to Bund-i-Nadri was along the western side of the valley; about half way, the sandy hills on this side project considerably into the plain, narrowing it very much. Our road ascended the heights, but about a mile or so to the south we descended again, and found the valley nearly as wide as at Penjdeh. Our camp was pitched on a piece of level ground close to the hills. The Bund-i-Nadri was not far from us, but it turned out to be the Old Bund, which had been made on a bed of the river, which the water of the Murghab had forsaken, and a new bund, or dam, higher up, was mentioned as having been made. The Bund-i-Nadri Canal, a large water-course for irrigation, flowed past close to us; it was filled with a beautiful clear stream. This is the canal whose water had been led, at some former period, across the Pul-i-Khisti.

Our next march was also on the western side of the valley, along the base of the hills; and again we left the level soil, to pass through a hollow among them, which extended for some miles. On coming out again on the valley, we passed a Turkoman village, which I understood was the last of them towards the south. We struck across the valley to the river, where there are the piers only of a brick bridge standing. At this place there is a ford, which we crossed. Sir Peter Lumsden placed a number of Turkomans across the river, along the whole line of the ford, thus carrying out the military rule, which was very necessary, as the ford was far from being a straight line, and the current was strong. By this means all got over in perfect safety; even mild Hindoos, on very small baggage-animals, who smoke and sleep instead of looking out where they are going, crossed scatheless. Our camp was formed close to the ford, and for the first time on the right bank of the Murghab.

Maruchak is on the same side; it is some distance from the river, and little over a mile from the ford. We were rather surprised at the extent of its walls, which would imply that the place had been inhabited at a later period than the other ruined towns we had seen. Our party found pheasants very plentiful at Maruchak, and there was some good shooting there. From Maruchak to Karaoul Khaneh, which was the ground of our next march, has not yet been repeopled, and the whole space is at present in the condition of a vast game preserve. The birds flew up in great numbers, and when the sportsmen came in covering the ground with long rows of dead pheasants, the only complaint heard referred to the deficiency of cartridges.

After passing Maruchak, the hills change in their form; below that place they are undulating and rounded, but the curves have a very long radius. Above Maruchak they form small rounded knobs, with steep sides, all the way up to Bala Murghab, to the south of which the geology entirely changes. The march from Maruchak to Karaoul Khaneh was on the right bank of the river. Towards the end of the march, we struck to the left, through a gorge formed by the steep sides of these mamelon hills, and came out again about a mile farther on. Karaoul Khaneh is the site of an old town; judging by the mounds, it had not been of great size. Here a valley comes in from the left, and, had the first idea of winter quarters beyond the Murghab been carried out, we were to have moved in this direction. But a change had been made, and Bala Murghab had been determined upon, so from Karaoul Khaneh we marched, still on the right bank of the river, and came on here, arriving on Dec. 12.

The other party, with the heavy part of the baggage, came in the next day. They followed our route as far as Tutichee, where they struck off to the right in the direction of Kushk. We expected to meet them at Bala Murghab on the day we arrived, but they entered the valley of the Murghab by another valley which brought them four miles below, and on the west side of the river; they had thus to cross to our side, on the right bank, which they did at a ford where they came out of the other valley. This took them all day, for the camels are slow at such operations. As it was getting dark before they managed to get over, they encamped there, and marched in here the next morning.

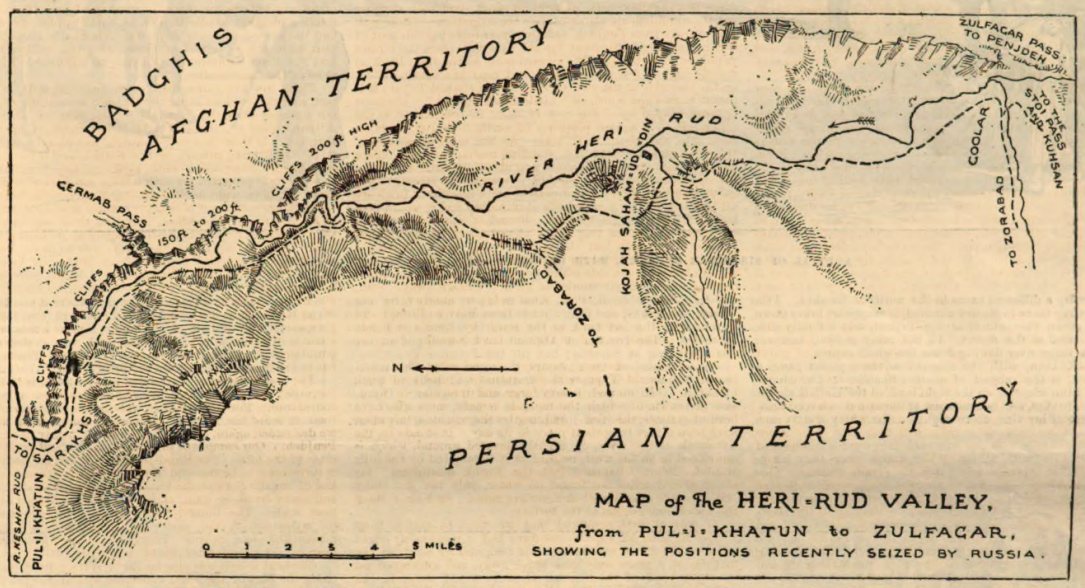
Bala Murghab, and the account of our winter quarters here, will be described in another letter. The severity of the winter is a subject on which we receive different estimates. Some say that the cold will be great; while others talk of a little snow, which will melt again in a day or so. The duration of the winter is also uncertain. It is at times very cold at nights, and warm again in the daytime, when the sun shines. Our party coming from Teheran have been very lucky in the matter of weather; with the exception of a slight shower or so at Shahrud, we have not had a drop of rain the whole way. Two days ago the sky became cloudy, and some rain fell; but it was very little. The weather is again bright and sunny, but of course cold at nights.



Had the Russian Commissioners come to Sarakhs at the time appointed—about the first or second week in November—a month's work, at least, might have been got through. A beginning would have been made, and it would have reduced and simplified the work to be done in the spring.

With reference to the places mentioned by our Special Artist in the foregoing letter, we have to remark that the last week's Number of this Journal contained his Sketches of the Kushk Valley, Kara Tapa, Kala-i-Maur, Ak Tapa, the junction of the Kushk and Murghab rivers, and Kona Penjdeh, with a View of Pul-i-Khisti, on the Kushk river, about six miles south-west of Penjdeh. The relative positions of the two places last named were incorrectly described both by Lord Granville and by the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in their statements in Parliament last week, when they spoke of Pul-i-Khisti as situated "north" of Penjdeh; and this is evidently owing to the error in the official map, recently detected by Major Holdich on the spot, and reported by our Special Artist. He informs us that Penjdeh is really situated more to the north-east, nearly twelve miles and a half from the site indicated on the official map. We believe that this point is of great political importance in the present dispute between the Russian and British Governments. The small Map of the Badghis country presented in our last, though a mere rough outline, correctly showed Pul-i-Khisti on the Kushk river south-west of Penjdeh, and about the same distance above the junction of the Kushk with the Murghab at Ak Tapa.

ON THE MURGHAB.

A notable place on the Murghab, twenty-eight miles above Penjdeh, visited by our Special Artist on his way to Bala Murghab, as he relates in the letter we now publish, is Maruchak, of which he has sent us several Sketches. The fording-place over the river, a mile from the town, is shown in one of the Illustrations published this week. Maruchak, on the right or east bank of the Murghab, was anciently a large and prosperous town; "now," says Mr. Simpson, "it is nothing but ruins. The Afghans are at present placing it in a state of repair. The outer wall is only of mud, or sun-dried bricks, and is, in some parts, in a very decayed condition. Over these walls the top of the citadel may be seen. This is one of the old mounds, of which we have observed similar remains in this country. It measures about 80 by 70 yards on the top. The old walls and towers are now being put in a condition of defence. From this citadel there is a great ramp, which runs in a circular form, from the north-west corner to the south-east corner. It is most probably the old wall, inclosing what had been the town at one period; the ramp has much the appearance of being the remains of a mud wall which has crumbled down into dust. The Afghans are now repairing it all round, so as to make it an enceinte for barracks, so that it will accommodate troops. The outer wall, already described, is to be levelled, as being too large for the garrison which the Afghans can afford to keep in it. There are the remains of a few mud houses within the outer wall; but, with the exception of the Afghans employed on the fort, there are no inhabitants. One of my Sketches is taken from the inside of the outer wall, and shows the Arg or citadel of Maruchak. It will be seen that the Arg is simply a large square mound of earth. The ridge from it running to the left is the great high ramp, which I have suggested may be the remains of a wall. It has been repaired on the top, and a cab might now be almost driven upon it. This Sketch shows a portion of the inside of the outer wall. The figures in the Sketch on the top of the Arg are the men at work rebuilding the walls."

The Murghab valley, from Tapa Bund-i-Nadri, is the View represented in another Sketch. This valley narrows in some places, and widens again; at Penjdeh there is a considerable width; above that it becomes narrow from the hills running into the valley, and it opens out at Bund-i-Nadri. It varies from a mile or a mile and half to perhaps four or five miles in width. This space is the flat bed of the valley, which may be nearly all cultivated. It implies a large capacity for the production of food, and explains why there are the ruins of so many large towns on the banks of the Murghab. The water covered with reeds, near the foreground, is an old bed of the Murghab. The river has now changed its position, and may be seen to the left of the View. The reeds here grow sometimes 20 ft. high.

MAP of the HERI-RUD VALLEY, from PUL-I-KHATUN to ZULFAGAR, SHOWING THE POSITIONS RECENTLY SEIZED BY RUSSIA.

DRAWN BY CAPTAIN A. F. BARROW, AIDE-DE-CAMP TO GENERAL SIR PETER LUMSDEN, BRITISH AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSIONER.

It was on Dec. 8 that Sir Peter Lumsden's party, having marched up the left bank of the Murghab from Penjdeh, crossed the river at Maruchak. Our Artist's Sketch of the fording-place shows the remains of an old bridge; the arches have fallen in, and the piers only are standing. On the centre pier are the remains of what seems to have been a tower. The foundations would appear to have been carried away, and the piers have leaned over, the central one looking like a stranded ship. The ford was close below the bridge, and it was crossed according to military rule; that is, Turkomans were placed along the line of the shallow part of the stream, so as to indicate the exact line to be followed. The Murghab is deep, and flows with a considerable current, so that if any of the camp-followers, crossing on mules or small ponies, had gone only a few feet off the correct line, they would have been swept away, and their chances, in such a case, of being saved, would have been very slight. From the precautions that were taken, all got over in perfect safety, though many of the animals were up to their girths in the middle of the river. In the distance the walls of Maruchak can be seen.

Bala Murghab, which the expedition reached on Dec. 12, was substituted as its winter quarters for Chahar Shamba, the place originally intended, which is forty or fifty miles east of the Murghab, on the road, we believe, to Maimene. The View of Bala Murghab shows a large mud fort which belongs to the Afghans, and has a garrison of their soldiers. There are some artillery here, and on Sir Peter Lumsden's arrival a salute of seventeen guns was given. The smoke of this is represented in the Illustration. The View is taken looking south, where a range of high hills can be seen, which are called the Tirbund-i-Turkestan; on the right there is a large break, through which the Murghab river flows. The river passes round the fort, and gives strength to its position.

ON THE HERI-RUD.

It will be recollected, from the Map already published, that the two rivers Murghab and Heri-Rud, flowing generally in a somewhat parallel direction beyond the hills north of Herat, with the country of Badghis inclosed between them, include the portion of the Afghan frontier which has been invaded by Russia. Having given some account of the eastern river, the Murghab, with its tributary, the Kushk, from Mr. Simpson's notes and the letter describing his journey to Bala Murghab, we will now speak of the Heri-Rud, which is the boundary river of Persia and Afghanistan down to Sarakhs, and which was therefore first approached by our Special Artist when he travelled eastward from Persia. He arrived, with the members of the British Commission, at Sarakhs on Nov. 7, and on the 11th they moved up the Heri-Rud to Nauruzabad, thence to Pul-i-Khatun, Khojah Saham-ud-din, Goolar, and on through the Stoi Pass to Kuhsan, where they were met by the Afghan Governor of Herat, Kazi Saad-ud-din, and by the Assistant Boundary Commissioner from India, Colonel Ridgeway, with his escort, consisting of the 11th Bengal Lancers and the 20th Punjaub Infantry. From Kuhsan, on Nov. 24, after the junction of these "two camps," as mentioned at the beginning of Mr. Simpson's letter, General Sir Peter Lumsden set forth to cross the upper part of Badghis to his winter quarters on the Murghab.

Kuhsan, sixty-eight miles from the city of Herat, on the frontier of the Persian territory of Khorassan, stands on the Heri-Rud where that river bends from a westerly to a northerly direction. The Heri-Rud, a beautiful river fertilising and enriching the valleys of North-Western Afghanistan, rises in the highlands of Hazara, and flows from east to west between the broad mountain range which the Greeks named the Paropamisus, now called the Safed Koh or "White Mountain," and the Siah Koh, to the city of Herat, and thence to Ghorian, where it turns north-west to Kuhsan. This district, copiously irrigated by artificial canals, was once populous and wealthy; it is one of the most ancient seats of civilisation. In the Middle Ages, during at least four centuries, Herat was one of the finest cities, and its province one of the most productive, in Central Asia. From Kuhsan to Sarakhs, by the road following the course of the Heri-Rud, the distance is eighty-four miles. This is the road on which the Russians have recently advanced more than half way, seizing Pul-i-Khatun, nearly forty miles from Sarakhs, and recently the Zulfagar Pass, thirty miles higher up the river, where an opening through the wall of cliffs on the eastern bank gives access to the interior of Badghis, and through Ak Robat to the Kushk valley and the Murghab.

Sarakhs, which the Russians were permitted to occupy soon after their conquest of Merv, and from which the understood line of Afghan boundary was to have been drawn eastward to the Oxus by the Joint Commission, consists of Old and New Sarakhs, three miles and a half apart, situated on opposite sides of the Heri-Rud, the bed of which, at that particular place, was dry at the season when the British Commission arrived there. This place belonged to Persia, but Old Sarakhs, on the eastern side, was handed over to the Russians by the Persian Governor. When our Special Artist visited Old Sarakhs, the Russian Governor-General of the Trans-Caspian Provinces, General Komaroff, was there, but only a few Russian troops, who were Akhal Turkomans recently enlisted in the Russian army. The Sketch now given shows the remains of the old city, which is entirely deserted; to the east and north there are a number of reed huts with a few people living in them. Old Sarakhs, as the Sketch will show, is merely a square mound, rising high above the present level of the desert, and this mound is no doubt an accumulation of rubbish formed by the destruction of houses and the rebuilding of them during a long course of time. The ruined walls of one building are all that stands of the old town; the rest of the space is a mass of bricks and weeds. The walls are of burned brick, but are in a very crumbling state. The town itself evidently has not had an inhabitant for many years. On the north and east are the remains of crumbling mud walls, which may have been inhabited since the old city was left to decay. The old tomb seen to the right of this View is called Baba Ogle; but there is a tradition that it is the tomb of Abel, the tomb of Cain being at New Sarakhs.

New Sarakhs, which is still occupied by the Persians, is on the western bank of the Heri-Rud, 300 yards from the river bed. It is of late date, and is possessed of the usual mud walls, with towers. The wall incloses a space of 700 yards diameter. The governor, Ali Mardan Khan, who has to deal with the whole of the frontier of this part of Persia, lives in the town, and has four or five hundred troops. Although the walls cover a good amount of ground, there are very few people in the place. In the Sketch, the mound of Old Sarakhs is just visible in the distance; in the foreground is one of the usual towers of refuge. Mr. Simpson made a separate sketch of the Meshed Gate of New Sarakhs, which shows the character of the crenelated walls and the towers. There are only two gates to the town—this gate, and another towards the north, called the Bokhara gate. Inside of the Meshed gate is the Arg, or citadel, where the governor lives, and the garrison have their quarters. A wall separates this from the other part of the town. There is a ditch, perhaps 10 or 12 feet deep, and nearly 20 feet wide, round the walls, with a covered way, or chemin de ronde, between the wall and the ditch. There are six small brass guns placed at various points, but the mud walls could offer no defence to a regular attack.

A curious feature of the river above Sarakhs is the dam, or "bund," as it would be termed in India, at Kizil-Koi, by which the water is diverted into streams for artificial irrigation. Kizil-Koi is eight miles higher up the river, between Sarakhs and Pul-i-Khatun. This dam, which is a very primitive affair, being made of wattles and earth, fills a water-course, which supplies Old Sarakhs; and New Sarakhs receives its supply of water on the other side of the Heri-Rud from a point not far distant. All cultivation in this region is done by means of irrigation derived from rivers and streams; and the protection of "water supply" is an important part of the frontier question. On the ordinary maps it will be seen that the Heri-

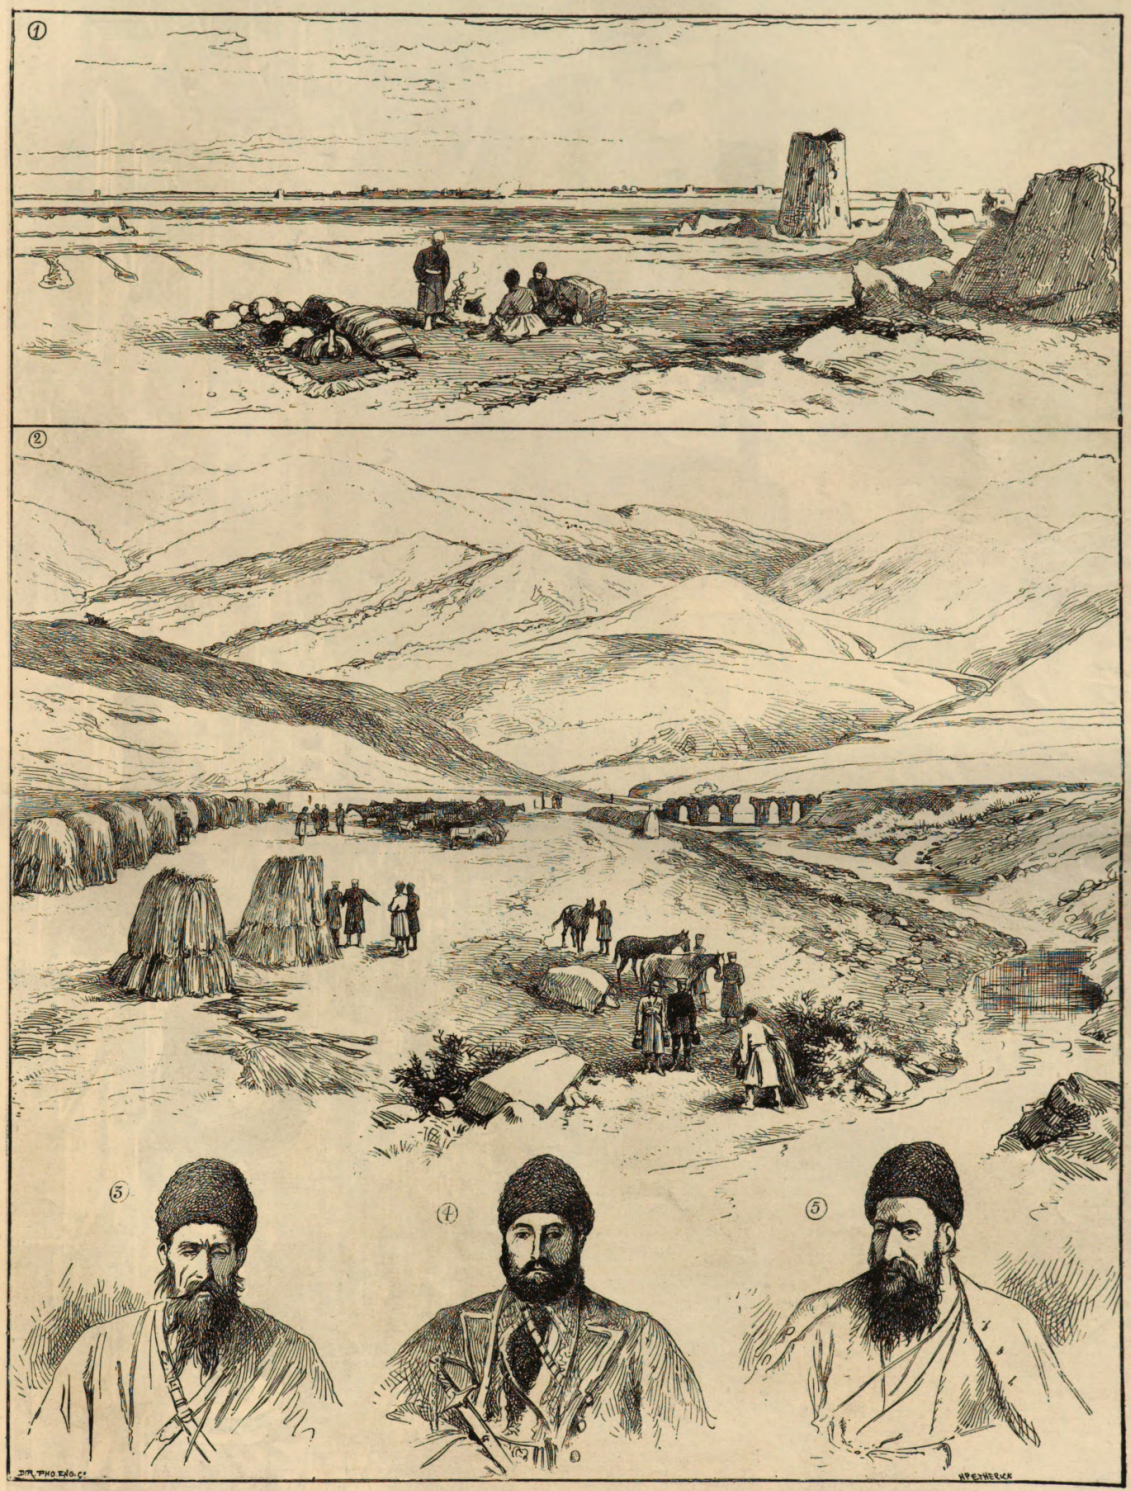
Rud goes by a different name to the north of Sarakhs. After disappearing there in its dry channel, it reappears lower down, and is known thenceforth as the Tejend, which finally sinks into the sand of the desert. In the rainy season, however, there is a large river flowing down the whole course.



Pul-i-Khatun, with the Russian advance picket camp at that place, is the subject of another Sketch. "The camp," says Mr. Simpson, "is on the right bank of the Heri-Rud, just below the bridge, and is composed of about a dozen reed huts; at the time of my visit, there might be about fifty or sixty men, perhaps half a sotnia. Pul-i-Khatun is very nearly forty miles south of Sarakhs, and is all that distance nearer to Herat. The ground on the left bank of the river is within the Persian frontier. The frontier of Afghanistan has been put on maps as beginning at Sarakhs; but till the Frontier Commission have accomplished their labours, the exact point must remain undetermined. Whether the Russians will hold to Pul-i-Khatun, as within their frontier, remains to be seen. There is no doubt that it has advantages as a military position. At ordinary times, the Heri-Rud is easily crossed almost anywhere, but in the rains there are few places where it can be forded. The Keshef-Rud has been our road eastward from Meshed, and we see the importance of the bridge here as a means of communication—that is, before the arch was destroyed. The bridge is said to have been erected by a wife of Timour. 'Pul' is the ordinary Persian word for bridge, and 'khatun' means lady; hence the name, translated into English, is 'The Lady's Bridge.' It is built of brick, and has been a substantial structure. The central arch was destroyed about sixty years ago in some frontier war. There are the ruins of a caravan-

The following notes, by Captain Arthur F. Barrow, supplied to our Special Artist with the Map of the Heri-Rud Valley, have some value with reference to any military operations in that locality:—"From Sarakhs as far as Pul-i-Khatun, movement on either bank presents no difficulties. To Daulatabad, twelve miles south of Sarakhs, both banks are level; from that to Pul-i-Khatun, the right bank dominates, and all movements on the right bank are under cover, and fully concealed from observation from the left bank; while, on the other hand, no military movement whatever could possibly be carried on upon the left bank, within at least six miles of the river, without full cognizance of the right bank. The river itself, by reason of its depth and width, is nowhere a military obstacle. At Pul-i-Khatun, the road passes through a narrow gorge; it is a mere track with steep gradients, and thence, as far as Goolar, would present great difficulties to the advance of even a small flying column with the lightest guns. Without weeks of labour, it could not be relied upon as a main line of communication practicable for heavy artillery with its ammunition column, with the ambulance and the heavy-wheeled transport and impedimenta of a large army. The river is, on the east side, shut out from Badghis by a steppe, which drops precipitously into it, the cliffs averaging from 150 ft. to 200 ft. in height. In this curtain there are two gaps, by which access to the river is obtained, called respectively the Germab and Zulfagar Passes. From Goolar, our route lay to the west of the river, which passes, it is said, through an impracticable gorge; several other routes are, however, available—one by way of Zorabad, where water is found; and there is said to be very little natural obstacle to an advance beyond Goolar by those routes. Enough has been said here to show that the possession of Pul-i-Khatun, by any Power which anticipates advancing on Herat in the future, is a desideratum of considerable value; for access to the Pass would naturally result in the immediate construction of a good road, along a stream of excellent water. At the same time, it must not be overlooked that the impenetrable nature of the cliffs, on the east bank of the river, render the use of this route, as a main line of advance, open to the very serious military objection that no lateral communication could exist with parallel lines of advance on that side; and that, in any combined movement, the force using this road might be met and defeated, at its exit, by a superior force of the enemy, while the other columns were being detained by inferior forces, occupying strong defensive positions. The occupation of Pul-i-Khatun by a weak Power, opposed to the advance of an army on Herat, and by one to which, owing to distance from its base, paucity of troops, or want of money, the conversion of Pul-i-Khatun into a defensive position is an impossibility, would at any rate result in the road remaining in its present condition; and would thereby deny its use to an enemy, at least for some considerable time after the declaration of hostilities."

The journey of the British Commissioner's party, accompanied by our Special Artist, from Teheran, the capital of Persia, to Bala Murghab, the farthest point eastward they have reached, including the detour between Sarakhs and Kuhsan, was a distance of nearly a thousand miles, all the way on horseback, and was performed between Oct. 2 and Dec. 12. An ordinary incident of the latter part of this long journey, "Breakfast on the March," after leaving Meshed, and in the Afghan territory, is represented in one of our Artist's Sketches. Sir Peter Lumsden, Mr. A. Condie Stephen, Major Holdich, R.E., Captains A. F. Barrow, De Lassoe, Durand, and Heath, Dr. Charles, Nawab Mirza Hassan Ali Khan, and Mr. Simpson, are the breakfasting party, and the dog "Jack" is waiting for scraps. The martial-looking attendant, wearing a sword, gold-laced frock-coat, top-boots, and a Persian hat, is Nasser, a Persian "abdarie," the official purveyor of meals for the travellers. One of his assistants, named Assad Beg, has been in London with Mr. Alison, of the Teheran Legation. The cooking apparatus, with the servants, is seen in the background.

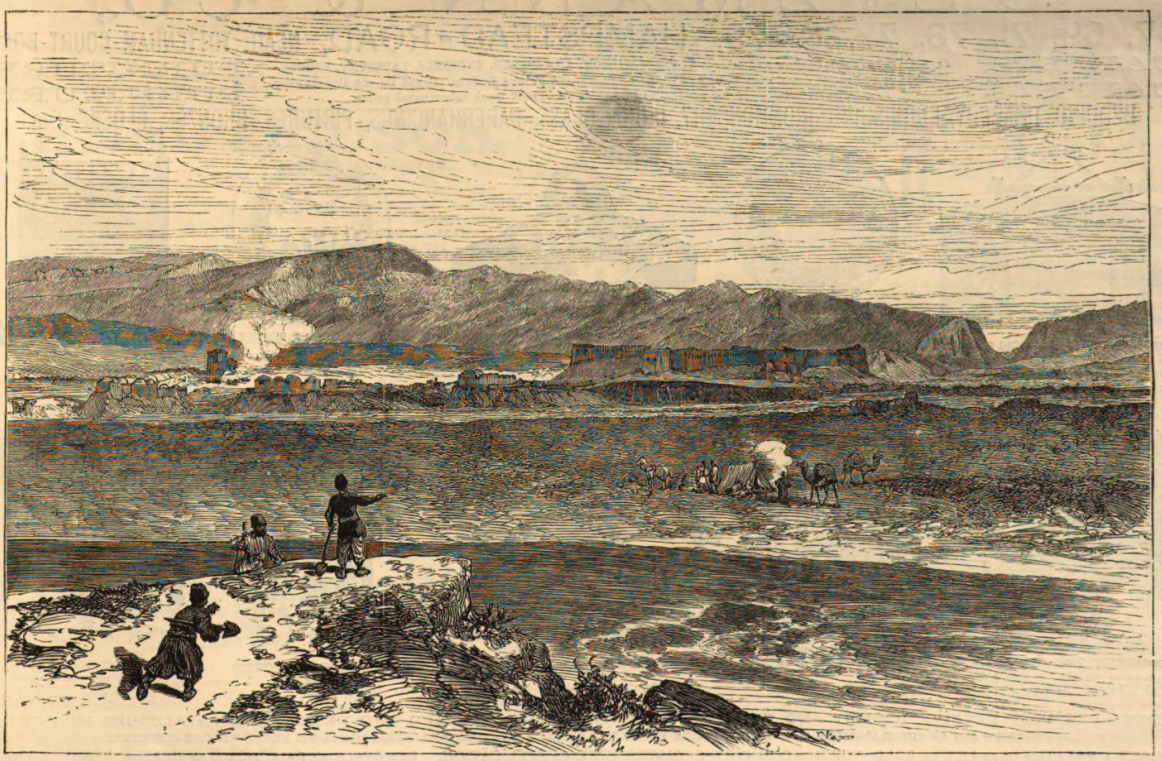
Sir Peter Lumsden's arrival at Ak Tapa, with his staff and escort of the 11th Bengal Lancers, accompanied by Kazi Saad-ud-din, the representative of the Ameer of Cabul, is the subject of another Sketch. The Afghan commander of the fort, General Ghous-ud-din Khan, has ridden forward to shake hands with Sir Peter; and, upon a sign from him, the trumpeter sounds a blast, and the Afghan troops fire a salute of seventeen volleys.

The Portraits given in this Number require a little comment. Mr. Simpson went alone to Old Sarakhs, to call on General Komaroff, the Russian Governor-General of the Trans-Caspian Provinces, who received him courteously, and entered into an interesting conversation on archæological topics. We present his Portrait, from a photograph taken at Tiflis, which he has sent to London for Mr. Simpson. Our Artist met also, at Old Sarakhs, the Governor of Merv, Colonel Alikhanoff, whose name was originally Ali Khan, being a Mussulman by birth, a native of Daghestan, in Circassia, but educated at Tiflis. He has the manners of a Russian gentleman, and is a clever amateur artist; he sketched for Mr. Simpson the figure of one of his Turkoman soldiers, a Tekke of Akhal. The Persian Governor of New Sarakhs, and of the whole frontier along the Heri-Rud, is now the Amir Ali Mardan Khan, an important chief of the Taimouris, in Khorassan, who usually resides at Meshed. He bears the honorary title of "Nusrat-ul-Mulk," and is a person of dignity; he entertained the British Commissioner in a handsome style. Ali Mardan Khan wrote his name on the Sketch in Persian characters, and here it is:



A Persian Sertip, or Colonel, named Masrullah Khan, a "Jami" or native of the district called Jam, on the border of Khorassan next to Herat, commanded the Persian escort from Meshed to Sarakhs, and thence to Kuhsan, where it was relieved by the Indian escort. This Persian officer is likewise a feudal chieftain, and is to be appointed governor of Jam. Wali Mohammed Khan, who was sent with a hundred sowars by the Ameer of Cabul to attend on the British Commissioner, is a Jamsheedie, one of the mixed Persian and Turkoman race inhabiting the country from Herat to the northern frontier of Afghanistan.

The encampment at Bala Murghab, where the members of the British Commission passed their Christmas, partly consisted, for the accommodation of the Indian soldiers, of Turkoman tents, which are peculiar in construction. They are called by the Turkoman people "alachuk," by the Persians and Afghans "khirynh," and by the Russians "kibitka." The lower part is formed of a series of cross pieces of wood, fixed together, so that, like the action of a pair of scissors at each crossing, they can be extended or contracted at pleasure, according to the diameter required. This part, with the framework of the door, is first put up, and held together with belts made of wool. The crown of the tent has a circular piece of wood pierced with holes; into these holes are placed the ends of one or two long pieces of stick, and then the crown is erected, and held there by tying the lower end of the sticks to the top of the circular framework. Having fixed the crown with one or two of the sticks, sticks are then placed all round the tent, to support the roof. When this is done, the whole is covered with thick felts, which are strapped on with belts and ropes. A small piece of felt forms a hood to cover the crown; this can be moved by a rope, so as to make an opening on any side desired to let out the smoke or let in light. The advantage of the kibitka is the absence of the central pole, with a greater protection from cold than in a canvas tent, and a fire can be made in it with safety. It is approved by the medical officers for the hospital of the camp.

The men of Major Meiklejohn's 20th Punjaub Infantry, on the evening of New-Year's Day, entertained themselves with a "bungra," or wild dance, peculiar to their native district, the Khattuk Hills, between the Indus and Peshawur. The scene as they capered round the fire, all flourishing their swords, to the sound of fife and drum, is well represented in our Special Artist's Sketch. It was witnessed by Sir Peter Lumsden and most of the officers in camp at Bala Murghab.

Our Special Artist has not yet visited the city of Herat, but we are enabled to present a View, taken from the citadel on the northern side, furnished by a correspondent some years ago. Herat, now a town of 50,000 inhabitants, was in the Middle Ages one of the richest and grandest cities in Asia.

BALA MURGHAB, THE LATE HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE BRITISH AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.
SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. W. SIMPSON.

THREE RELIGIOUS PICTURES.

ECHENA'S "ARRIVAL AT CALVARY."

The simultaneous exhibition of three works deriving their subjects from scriptural sources might at first sight suggest a revival of religious art among us and our neighbours. A very cursory glance, however, will show that whatever use painters may make of the Gospel history, or of the legends which have collected around it, they are either incapable of infusing into its treatment those sublime naïvetés which distinguished the ages of faith, or else they are too eager to follow public sentiment than ambitious to lead it in new paths.

The first of these works to which we have to refer is Señor Echena's "Arrival at Calvary," to be seen at Messrs. Graves', Pall-mall. This enormous work, destined, if we mistake not, to be placed behind the high altar in the pro-Cathedral of Madrid, deserves especial notice as the production of a modern Spanish artist, upon whom foreign influence has had but little effect; and we are thus better able to estimate the position occupied by that country in modern art than is possible to gather from the works of such men as Fortuny, Madrazo, and others who have subjected their art to the requirements of French fashion and taste. In the present picture, painted throughout in a low tone of colour, the artist has at least chosen a seldom-painted episode of the awful tragedy. The sky above is a leaden grey, but round the horizon is gathering that darkness which later on was to cover all. The procession has just reached the summit; Christ, worn out with suffering and fatigue, seems scarcely able to advance. Alone, deserted, yet erect, the Man of Sorrow stands before us, his white robe soiled and disordered, whilst from his brow the blood is dropping beneath the crown of thorns. All his disciples have left him; the only faithful one is the Magdalen pressing forward with her box of scent, which she is eagerly urging him to take. Beside her are one or two other sympathetic women, who have forced themselves in front of the soldiers, and, with sublime devotion to their Lord, are heedless of the jeers of which they are the objects. In the foreground, with their backs to the spectator, are the two thieves, bound and awaiting their doom, of which the instruments, two rough crosses, are lying on the ground. On one of these a man is busy shaping it so as to fit it into the socket-hole already dug; whilst another, in brutal indifference, seated on the cross itself, recalls at once a figure by Ribera. On the left of the spectator, the Roman soldiers are keeping back the crowds of Jewish people and priests who are attempting to close round the place of execution, and the impotent rage of these contrasts forcibly with the stolid discipline of the soldiers, intent only on their duty of keeping Golgotha clear. In the background, tolling up the last ascent of the steep, are to be seen Simon the Cyrenian and a host of others—disciples, scoffers, or apostates, with whom devotion or curiosity has triumphed over fear of the Romans. The whole scene is, apart from the central figure, a tumultuous one—not, perhaps, more so than it may have been in reality, but conceived in a wholly different spirit to those Crucifixion scenes in which the great masters of the Renaissance delighted, and into which they threw all the serenity of assured faith and deep-seated conviction.

MUNKACSY'S "CALVARY."

The picture entitled "Calvary," by Herr M. Munkacsy, on exhibition by Messrs. Agnew, at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, whilst conceived in a somewhat similar spirit, displays a totally different technique. In Señor Echena's work, low tones and subdued colouring predominate; but in Herr Munkacsy's, dark shadows, broad lines of rich colour on a black background, form the basis of his art. The Spanish painter, moreover, has managed to arrest the attention of the spectator upon the chief actor in the awful scene; whilst Herr Munkacsy, with singular misapprehension, has so dexterously balanced the figure of the livid Christ on the cross by the figure of the Roman centurion, on a white horse, that the whole interest, as a matter of composition, is centred in the repulsive figure of the executioner—a burly figure in a blue gown, brandishing a hatchet—who occupies the middle of the canvas. The scene, as painted by Herr Munkacsy, is grand and striking enough, but it seems to us to be wholly wanting in religious inspiration, and even in originality of conception. The grouping of the scene may be Herr Munkacsy's own, as is undoubtedly the surging of the angry crowd; but nearly each individual figure suggests a foreign authorship. The Christ on the Cross is a reminiscence of Vandyck or Rubens; the Virgin Mother's attitude at the foot of the Cross is that of Gérôme; the Martha fainting is from Daniele da Volterra; and the St. John is Guido's; and so on throughout the work. The moment chosen is the awful one when the last cry had just been uttered and the Saviour's head is bowed, but before the look of peaceful rest has settled upon his sorrow-seamed features. Ranged behind the Roman soldiers, and occupying the greater part of the canvas, are the chief priests and people, for a moment awed and hushed, except one old man, who mockingly is bidding the King of the Jews to come down from the Cross. On the left the Centurion on a white charger turns away sorrowfully, casting a wistful glance behind; whilst in the foreground two elders—perhaps Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea—in close converse, are walking slowly away from the spot. At the extreme edge of the picture is the figure which detracts greatly from the dignity of the scene—a man running away, with fear, rather than remorse, depicted on his face. It can scarcely have been intended to be Judas, whose traditional hair would have indicated him; and one can only presume that under this somewhat ignoble figure Herr Munkacsy has intended to portray Ahasuerus, the legendary wanderer.

It is impossible to place this work of Munkacsy's on a level with his "Christ before Pilate." It is wanting not only the composition, but the poetic inspiration which marked the earlier work; and, however much awe we may feel in presence of the scene which the artist has reproduced, it must be allowed that he has done nothing to add to its sublimity and deep tragedy. The story as told by the Evangelist is more touching than Herr Munkacsy's pictorial illustration of it.

HOLMAN HUNT'S "TRIUMPH OF THE INNOCENTS."

If we pass from the Egyptian Hall to the Fine-Arts Society's Gallery in Bond-street, we shall find how one of our own countrymen treats a religious subject. Mr. Holman Hunt is at the very antipodes of art to either of the foreigners above alluded to. They are realists in the fullest nineteenth-century sense of the word. Mr. Holman Hunt is a pure idealist, and in his picture of "The Triumph of the Innocents" he has selected a subject thoroughly congenial to his art. Although the episode of the Flight into Egypt belongs to the domain of Scripture history, the artist has seized upon one of those beautiful legends which crystallised round every event which was in any way connected with the Holy Child's early life. The moment chosen is when the cavalcade has passed in safety the ridge of mountains which lie behind Bethlehem towards the sea, but are still pressing onwards, while the darkness shelters them, in order to escape from Herod and the effects of his cruel decree.

The mother is seated on an ass of the Mecca breed, which Joseph is carefully but rapidly leading across the flowery plain watered by pure springs which seem to be rising beneath their feet. The Holy Child is lying on his mother's lap, and engaging all her attention—a figure of exquisite beauty and childhood's grace. Beside them trots the ass's foal, with difficulty able to keep pace with its dam, but unwilling to be separated from her. Behind is the water-wheel and mill-house, whence the dogs, aroused by the passing travellers, have come out to bark, but at the strange sight are slinking, voiceless, away. On the distant hillside the watchfires are burning, and to these Joseph ever and again turns his head to see if his flight is discovered, and an alarm given. Nothing, however, breaks the solemn beauty of the scene, upon which Mr. Holman Hunt has not laboured in vain. But to depict this was only one half of the artist's self-appointed task. The Child upon his mother's lap is calling her attention to the company around; the spirits of the martyred children of Bethlehem troop round the Holy Family—some garlanded, others like enrolled saints and priests, or with branches of palm and blossoming trees. These children in their spiritual bodies bear no trace of the wounds of which they were the victims, although their torn or cut dresses bear evidence of the executioner's knife, and one little child is still wondering at its broken coral necklace, of which it holds the pieces in its hand. On the other side of the river is another group of children, more conscious of the divinity of the Child passing by; whilst behind and high up in the air is another group, still sleeping and grieving, the only suggestion of pain and sorrow in the picture. Out of the ground the ever-rolling crystal stream is constantly breaking into transparent bubbles, in which one can trace the Tree of Life, the happiness of the blest, and other promises of the Patriarchs—hopes and aspirations with which the minds of the pious were at that time filled.

Such, briefly, is Mr. Holman Hunt's last work, which cannot fail to add greatly to his reputation as a colourist, a draughtsman, and as a poet. He has touched a chord which cannot fail to vibrate in every heart, and he attains his end without effort and without pedantry. The children's faces are exquisite studies of child-life in the East, where the picture was carefully, and amid many difficulties, composed, although this reproduction of it was painted in this country. It is never difficult to raise objections to certain minor details of Mr. Hunt's treatment. His ways are not the ways of ordinary artists; and his hand, like his imagination, must be allowed a certain freedom. The principal fault we find in the work is the transposition of the real and the imaginary elements. The actual disposition of the light suggests that the children—solid, bright, and full of life—are real children, before whose simple, unastonished eyes are passing in the rich moonlight the Holy Cavalcade. It is scarcely any reply to say that these celestial children carry with them their own self-generated light, and that hence comes their strength and distinctness. They are incidents of a scene which passes at midnight, and are, therefore, subject to the ordinary laws of light and shadow. Again, there is something almost grotesque, and in no sense elevating, in the group of half-emancipated children poised in the air; whilst the bright blue cap of one of the children in the lower group jars with every colour in the rest of the picture. But there is in "The Triumph of the Innocents" much that is so good—so far beyond the reach of other artists of any school—that such blemishes as these we pass by with scarcely a word of protest, and commend the picture most heartily to those who believe in and to those who misdoubt the revival of religious art in our days.

Dr. Carter Moffat's AMMONIAPHONE Harness' Patent

is invaluable in all Pulmonary Affections. It is a tube about 25 in. long, constructed of a specially prepared non-corrosive metal, with handles, having patent spring valves. It is charged with a chemical compound, combined so as to resemble in effect that which is produced by the soft balmy air of the Italian peninsula when inhaled into the lungs, hence the term—Artificial Italian Air.

THE VERDICT OF THE DOCTORS.

"14, Conduit-street, London, W., Dec. 20, 1884.

"The two AMMONIAPHONES that I had from you have given very good results. Apart from improved timbre, resonance, and extension of register, which are undeniable, I have found the AMMONIAPHONE most useful in cutting short catarrhal and laryngeal troubles, and of great benefit in removing hoarseness. Several patients have tried the AMMONIAPHONE at my suggestion, and are all pleased with the improvement in their voices.

Dr. A. KINGSFORD, writing in the "Lady's Pictorial," Nov. 29, says:—"To these general recommendations I may advantageously add a new and peculiar one, for which I am indebted to the invention of Dr. Carter Moffat. I speak of the AMMONIAPHONE, an instrument constructed on ingenious principles, and skilfully adapted to its purpose. The ingredients used in the AMMONIAPHONE are principally peroxide of hydrogen and free ammonia; the nature of the others is not disclosed, but we are assured that they are of an equally harmless nature. Both of these substances have been long employed as anti-spasmodic agents in cases of ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING-COUGH, &c., but to Dr. Carter Moffat belongs the credit of combining their action in an instrument of portable and elegant form, applicable to popular use. . . . The stimulative action of ammonia on the cerebral centres of the nerves specially affected in ASTHMA, and its generally beneficial influence on the ganglionic and spinal systems, are familiar to all medical practitioners, and it is for such reasons that it is constantly administered, both interorly and exteriorly, in cases of HYSTERIA and SWOONING, as well as in those of NERVOUS DEPRESSION and EXHAUSTION. A daily deep inhalation of the contents of an 'AMMONIAPHONE' will invigorate and brace the nervous centres of respiration, and thus set up a tonic, reaction on the larynx and organs of the thorax. I think you cannot do better than to follow my example—for I need hardly add that I have myself purchased an 'AMMONIAPHONE'—and take regularly, as I do, your appointed ration of peroxide of hydrogen and free ammonia."

Dr. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE will last for years. Should be used by Actors, Vocalists, Clergymen, Public Speakers, Parliamentary Men, Readers, Reciters, Lecturers, Leaders of Psalmody, Schoolmasters, Amateurs, Church Choirs, Barristers, and all persons who have to use their voices professionally, or who desire to greatly improve their speaking or singing tones, producing a rich, powerful, melodious voice, of extraordinary clearness and range.

DR. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE

has proved of the utmost value in the treatment of COUGHS, COLDS, CLERICAL THROAT, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CONSUMPTION, APHONIA, or LOSS OF VOICE, DEAFNESS resulting from Colds, all Affections of the Throat and Chest, and Sleeplessness. Such ailments may be entirely overcome by means of this simple and beneficent invention.

THE PUBLIC PRAISE IT.

The Very Rev. Dr. VAUGHAN, Dean of Llandaff and Master of the Temple, writes:—

"My voice has now nearly recovered its tone, and I have certainly derived benefit, though not suddenly or rapidly, from the use of your AMMONIAPHONE."

Lady MACFARREN (wife of Sir G. A. Macfarren, the distinguished President of the Royal Academy of Music), writes:—

"7, Hamilton-terrace, N.W., Oct. 22, 1884.

"I consider the AMMONIAPHONE to have a wonderfully bracing effect on the vocal organs, and shall have great pleasure in recommending it to such as have weak or relaxed throats; indeed, I have already done so."

The Rev. AUBREY C. PRICE, B.A., Chesterton, Clapham Park, S.W., Jan. 27, 1885, writes:—

"I have great pleasure in bearing very high testimony to the value of Dr. Carter Moffat's AMMONIAPHONE. I tried it first after a week of very hard work, in which I had preached twelve sermons. My voice was thin and weak, and my throat was very sore. The AMMONIAPHONE put all this right in a single day, and not only enabled me to speak as easily and well as if I had had previously no extra work, but actually enabled me to speak with far more ease and comfort than usual. I have given it A FAIR TRIAL UNDER EXCEPTIONALLY HARD CONDITIONS, and I can bear conscientious testimony to its value in sustaining and clearing the voice to an almost marvellous degree, and in PREVENTING to a great extent the WEARINESS and SORENESS of the throat, which I have usually experienced as the consequence of a long and severe exercise of the vocal organs."

CHARLES WYNDHAM, Esq., Criterion Theatre, writes:—

"Jan. 15, 1885.

"I have now used the AMMONIAPHONE which you forwarded to me about a fortnight ago, and, although sceptical at first, I am bound now to confess it is of very great service to me."

"THERE WAS NO DENYING IT."

"PALL MALL GAZETTE," Nov. 7, 1884:—

"Last night St. James's Hall was filled with an intelligent company of musical and scientific people, who were invited to witness the results of the AMMONIAPHONE. . . . The doctor himself, surrounded by distinguished vocalists, all of whom were Ammoniaphonical votaries, explained, instrument in hand, the wonders of his new discovery. . . . Our representative was invited to repeat a few lines in his natural voice, then take some deep inhalations and repeat the same words over again. He did so, and was positively startled at the loudness and sonority of his own voice. The thing seemed absurd; but THERE WAS NO DENYING IT: the INCREASED VOLUME and IMPROVED TIMBRE were TOO OBVIOUS."

DR. CARTER MOFFAT attends daily at the Rooms of the MEDICAL BATTERY CO., 205, Regent-street, London, W., to demonstrate the extraordinary utility of the Ammoniaphone. Write for the "HISTORY OF THE AMMONIAPHONE," an eighty-page treatise, post-free on application.

DR. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE (Harness' Patent) will be sent free by post to any part of the United Kingdom on receipt of P.O.O. or Cheque (crossed "London and County Bank") for 21s., and payable to

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: ZEREBA AND ADVANCED REDOUBT NEAR SOUAKIM.
FROM A SKETCH BY A NAVAL OFFICER.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

The profession of medicine appears to be eminently favourable to intellectual activity. Philosophers, artists, and men of letters are ranked among its members. Sir Thomas Browne was not more famous in his own day as a physician than he is in ours as an author. Dr. Arbuthnot was the greatest wit of his age, with the exception of Swift, who said of him that he could do everything but walk. Garth, one of the best men in the world according to Pope, found time, in spite of a large practice, to write a poem, which has secured him a place in Dr. Johnson's "Lives," where a niche is also found for Blackmore, who obtained "high eminence and extensive practice." He published several epic poems of vast length, one of which, says the biographer, if he had written nothing else, would have transmitted him to posterity among the first favourites of the English muse—a statement to which posterity is not likely to subscribe. Oliver Goldsmith, best beloved of writers, can scarcely be said to have combined literature with medicine, for his advice was seldom asked or taken, and he seems to have killed himself at last by an unfortunate prescription. Akenside, too, who wrote the "Pleasures of Imagination," lived for a time more on those pleasures than on the fees of his patients; but gained a good position eventually, though he died too soon to reap the fruits of it. In our century, especially in our day, the illustrations of this variety in intellectual pursuits on the part of medical men grow too numerous to mention. The latest proof of it may be seen in the announcement that Sir Henry Thompson has found time amidst his severe professional labours to write a clever novel called "Charley Kingston's Aunt."

In a life just published of Charles Leslie, the non-juror, it is stated that Dryden was a member of the Kit-Cat Club. Now, as the poet died in 1700, and the famous club was not formed until two or three years later, it follows that if Dryden was a member it must have been in what the Spiritualists call a "materialised form." And the writer is surely mistaken, too, in complaining of the general dulness of these "lights of the Whig party." If Addison, Congreve, Steele, Vanbrugh, and Garth can be called dull, where, among the Queen Anne men, are we to look for wit and humour? One may be sure that the Ranelagh Club, which has just acquired Barn Elms, where once the Kit-Cat wits were wont to meet, will not revive the sallies of mirth and the brilliant bons mots which made the old place so famous in the early years of the last century. Men grow serious in these days; and sport, as most of us are aware, is a very serious matter indeed.

There may be, and no doubt is, considerable mercantile depression both in England and on the Continent; but the bad state of things does not prevent unique works of art fetching as large prices as in the most prosperous times. So soon as it was mooted that the portrait of Mrs. Hibbert, painted by Gainsborough, and shown at the recent Exhibition of Old Masters, was for sale, huge offers were made from all parts of Europe. The Berlin Museum sent a special emissary to secure the treasure; but he was outbid by Messrs. Wertheimer, the well-known dealers, who purchased it for £10,000, this being the largest price ever known to have been paid for a kit-cat. Certainly, it seems a lot of money to pay for a canvas 49 inches by 39 inches. The misfortune is that the work is to go abroad, having been purchased for a foreign collection; but it is some consolation to know that English painters are appreciated to such an extent out of their own country.

Foreigners have extraordinary ideas about the customs and manners of the English, as their newspapers and books of travel show from time to time. But a Russian who has been for a considerable period residing in the vicinity of Bethnal-green seems to have outdone his fellow-Continentals for bold and original ignorance as to the duties of parochial guardians and the intentions and objects of the workhouse. It became necessary for this Muscovite to visit his native country, but it was unnecessary for the purposes of his journey that he should take with him his two young children. He had an idea, however, that he must provide for them somehow during his absence, so it struck him that an intimation to the authorities of his parish of his intention to leave his offspring behind him would ensure their safe custody and their little comforts during his absence. The magistrate of his district speedily enlightened him as to the law; but the Russian having indignantly stated that he was prepared to repay the guardians for their trouble and expense, was forced to make private arrangements, and will probably return to his native land under the impression that a country in which the workhouses are not lodging-houses for infants is not worth living in.

Connection between sailors and the Turf would seem, at the first blush, as unlikely as communication between Jews and Samaritans; for, among the popular novelists especially, "Jack," though he always "gets aboard" some sort of quadruped ashore, is invariably represented as regardless, and even contemptuous, of all that relates to horses and jockeyship. And yet the Navy has, from the very earliest times, supplied some of our most distinguished patrons of the Turf. It is true that his Majesty Admiral King William the Fourth—who started his "whole fleet" for the Goodwood Cup in 1830, and ran first, second, and third, with Fleur-de-lis, Zinganee, and The Colonel—did not care a straw about sport, and raced in a perfunctory manner, to keep up the traditions of the family; but it was different with Admiral Norris, a member of the Jockey Club at its foundation, or, at any rate, as early as 1757; with Admiral Boscawen, a double portion of whose spirit has descended to Lord Falmouth; with Admiral Rous, late "dictator of the Turf"; with the late Lord Glasgow, who had been in the Navy; with Admiral Harcourt, who won the Derby with Ellington in 1856, and ran a dead-heat for the Oaks with Gildermire in 1858; and it would not be difficult, no doubt, to swell the list. At the present day, Admiral the Duke of Edinburgh is a member of the Jockey Club by virtue rather of his lineage than of the direct patronage he bestows upon horse-racing; but in Admiral G. Tryon we have a naval officer who imports "Arabians," and who won the "Arab race" at Newmarket last year with Asil. Naval officers, moreover, have been distinguished as "gentlemen riders." The afore-mentioned Admiral Norris appears to have been a conspicuous "jock" as Captain Norris; and there is on record a feat performed in 1800 by a "naval officer," whose name is lost to us. This officer made a wager that he would ride a blind horse round the race-course at Sheerness without "guiding the reins with his hands"; and he "realised the stakes" by cutting the reins asunder and fastening the ends to his feet in the stirrups, "steering" the blind horse something after the present fashion of the "coxswainless fours." From which it would appear that "Jack" is not always so simple, guileless a creature as the poet Dibdin and certain novelists would make us believe.

When Mr. Bancroft secured his lease of the Haymarket Theatre and altered and redecorated it according to his taste, he did away with the time-honoured institution of the pit. This course provoked considerable discussion in theatrical circles; but the example was followed, and the Opera Comique, in the Strand, was built without any pit at all. However, the course of public requirements has now declared in favour of this portion of an auditorium, and report says that the Haymarket pit is to be restored under the new management, and it is publicly announced that the Opera Comique has been reconstituted, and a commodious and handsome pit added. The manager of one of the largest London theatres tells us that, in the aggregate, more people visit the pits of the theatres than all the other parts of the houses put together—excluding the galleries.

Gentlemen who give a thousand guineas a leg for young race-horses have received another warning. It is less than a year since Mr. Brodrick-Cloete gave 4000 guineas for Louisbourg, son of Hampton and Chevisaunce, the finest "youngster" at Lord Falmouth's famous sale; and now the horse, without ever doing anything in public, is dead. A grander animal to look at, according to excellent authority, was never seen; a red bay with black points, with as commanding an appearance as Dover Castle, yet he went out suddenly like a candle after a few flickers. It was about the middle of February when Mr. Cloete thought it time that the horse should be pushed a little to see what there was under the magnificent exterior; and the horse at once went "off his feed," lost flesh, suffered from a fetid discharge at mouth and nostrils, and died—of tubercles on the lungs, it is said—on the last day of that month. Mr. Brodrick-Cloete has begun the year badly; and it is to be hoped that Paradox, for whom he gave a thousand more than "a thousand guineas a leg," will bring him compensation. It is noteworthy, however, that Paradox, after remaining first favourite for the Derby, as well as for the Two Thousand, during so many months, was all but supplanted entirely the other day by Melton. Still, the position of a favourite, whether horse or man, is always precarious; and it is sometimes possible to be misled by what seems to be the shadow of a coming event. At any rate, with Duke of Richmond, St. Blaise, Luminary, Ptolemy, and Match Girl in the same stable, and Whipper-In also to "keep the clock," there ought to be no mistake made about the capabilities of Paradox.

Sunday-school teaching has never been regarded as an occupation commanding large emoluments, but, on the other hand, it has been considered as a calling which brings with it a certain amount of respect from the community. No doubt a Sunday-school teacher has plenty of spare time during the six days of the week to undertake extraneous employment, but the particulars of a recent application for occupation are indeed astounding. Hangmen have of late given deserved dissatisfaction for the way they have done or not done their hideous work, and before every execution the authorities are pestered with applications from amateurs anxious to try their hands on the unfortunate condemned convict. People who are starving may be, perhaps, excused, for being willing to undertake such awful deeds; but a Sunday-school teacher offering himself is an extraordinary incident. Yet it is reported from Birmingham that such a one proffered his services, and positively sent in his teacher's certificate as evidence of his steadiness and trustworthiness. It must be satisfactory to the pupils he enlightens on the Sabbath that his offer was not accepted.

Some clergymen have been once more denouncing horse-racing and steeplechasing, and demanding to have those sports put down with the strong hand. The denunciation is, no doubt, perfectly just to a certain extent; but the wide popularity of the sports is what makes their attendant evils so conspicuous; and to talk of putting down national pastimes, until their hour of natural decadence has come, with the strong hand, is, with all deference, to talk nonsense. It would be much more to the purpose if some philosopher could discover why it is that people who have to do with horses—especially race-horses—seem so frequently to suffer from some moral obliquity of some kind; the cause having been discovered, a remedy might be found. It might puzzle even the clergy, perhaps, to prove that there is something intrinsically bad in horse-racing and steeplechasing; and there are many things which are intrinsically bad, such as the gambling at the clubs and at Tattersall's, and which, nevertheless, it is found to be impossible to suppress. How, then, can anybody hope to suppress national sports, in which, of themselves, there is a great deal that is good, and nothing much worse than in hunting, shooting, fishing, or even cricket? The idea, with deference again, is absurd.

Some curious details respecting the position of Germans in the Chinese service have been given in a private letter published in a French journal. A short time ago, a Celestial dignitary named Li-Fong-Pao went to Berlin, and there engaged 125 officers and men for various posts all of whom have been obliged to adopt Chinese appellations. The former captain of a corvette is metamorphosed into Wang-Li-Triang, or Captain Great Wall, and promoted to the rank of Admiral, and his flag floats over the cruiser Chao-Yung. Another is called Lin-Pao, or Six Cannons, and there are many other similar names. It is probable that gentlemen in these positions are very highly remunerated; for the German artillerymen chosen receive £40 per month, and the skilled mechanics £60; while, in addition, a sum of £1200 will be paid to the families of everyone who is killed. Men will risk a great deal for these prices, which represent even more to the thrifty Germans than they do to Englishmen.

That our Poet Laureate is immensely admired on the other side of the Atlantic is well known, but whether that admiration is sufficient in any one instance to induce a wealthy American to become a Lincolnshire landowner remains to be seen. A prominent advertisement in a New York paper informs all who may be desirous of acquiring twelve hundred acres in the old country, that the estate of Somersby and Bag Enderby is for sale, and that it includes the advowson of Somersby, and the quaint old-fashioned residence where Lord Tennyson was born, and where he and his many brothers spent their early years. The latter attraction is decidedly "fetching," but what if Brother Jonathan should have conscientious scruples about the purchase of an advowson?

A determined effort was made to stop this year the grant of 250,000f. (£10,000) given by the French Government for the support of horse-racing on the flat in France; and the stoppage was carried in the Chamber, though only by two votes. The Senate, however, on the energetic representation of General Deffis and Count Saint-Vallier, restored the grant without a single dissentient.

The bouquets which fair maids and matrons take to Court with them nowadays are less elaborate than those of a few years ago, but many of them are less calculated to bear the strain of long waiting first in the carriage and then in the Palace. This is principally because most of the flowers, such as white lilac, lilies of the valley, Maréchal Niel and other tea roses, have been so rapidly forced. If they could be brought on more gradually they would not droop so soon. This is a principle applicable in other matters besides flower culture.

Princess Dolgorouki, after tasting the joys and griefs of this life in varied measure, has an ambition—she wishes to have a salon. She has taken up her permanent abode in Paris in a charming hotel formerly occupied by the Austrian Embassy, and last Sunday she gave an inaugurative dinner, and gathered round her some prominent and restless spirits, among whom were Comte Ferdinand De Lesseps, Alexandre Dumas, Ernest Renan, the two Houssayes, Cabanel, Albéric Second, and Count Schouvaloff. They represented considerable diversity of opinion.

A covering for the shoulders which has been common in England for the last two or three years, has now become completely naturalised in France. This is the petite pélerine which we mostly wear in fur or to match our dresses, but across the Channel they are more varied. For evenings sans cérémonie, or for the theatre, they are made à la neige—that is to say, of ruchings of white crêpe or tulle; but for out-of-doors they are of Indian cashmere and bright-coloured satin broché, with old-silver clasps. The new colours in which fashion decrees that they shall appear during the spring are capucine, betterave, old oak, and Chinese porcelain, the latter being an intricate mixture of dark blue, coral, green, and gold.

It is a fact worthy of remark and even of imitation that when a great Austrian noble embarks in any kind of business he is proud of it, and never dreams of dissociating his name from his manufacture. There are some well-known digestive tablets sold in boxes on which the titles "Prince Lobkowitz, Duc de Raudnitz," appear in full, and the armorial bearings of the Prince's family serve as trade-marks. The late Count Kinsky, who was a politician in his youth and became a financier in his old age, was a noble whose high descent was almost lost in the mists of antiquity; and, indeed, there is hardly an Austrian patrician who is not an ironmaster, a builder, brewer, or wood merchant, or who does not work his own mines, or personally exploiter any source of wealth with which Fortune has favoured him.

There is something pathetic in the discovery made by Mr. Stanley Hall, of Boston, of the idea American children have that the source and fullness of all happiness is to be found "in the country." Thousands of the little creatures who have been in "populous cities pent" all their lives, have never seen potatoes or roses growing, or gathered buttercups, so they do not practically know much about it; but they mentally locate all good things of which they are ignorant "in the country," and imagine that when good children die they are straightway transported to that region of delight. Surely their for man's first abode was a garden, and the tilling of the soil is accounted by one of our greatest thinkers "the chief duty and delight" of the human race.

> Life's star
> Hath had elsewhere its setting, and cometh from afar;

The English colony of jockeys, &c., at Chantilly has lately lost a somewhat notable member in Mr. Sprecty, who died the other day, at sixty years of age, and who, as long ago as 1853, rode the famous French mare Hervine, second for the Goodwood Cup, when another French mare, Jouvence, won. This was the very first French "win." Mr. Sprecty rode chiefly for the late M. Alexandre Aumont, to whom Hervine belonged, and latterly for Comte De Berteux, who attended the old jockey's funeral on the 2nd inst.

FINE ARTS.

F. WALKER'S WATER-COLOUR DRAWINGS.

The Loan Collection of Water-Colour Drawings by the late F. Walker, now on view at Mr. Dunthorne's Gallery in Vigo-street, although far from complete, is so well composed that it cannot fail to attract all who are interested in one of the most talented of recent English artists. So much has been said of Frederick Walker, and of his short career, that there is no need to refer to it at length; but those who care to know the chief incidents of his life as an artist cannot do better than study Mr. Comyns Carr's Essay, which is prefixed to the catalogue of the present exhibition. Walker, who before his premature death was destined to raise the standard of revolt against Academic traditions, had, in the outset of his career, shown the keenest anxiety to profit by Academic teaching. Happily for him, and for us, the training of Trafalgar-square was unable to smother those classical instincts which were apparently innate, and throughout his life he showed, even in his slightest work, traces of those self-taught lessons which he had learnt among the Elgin marbles and the other antique sculptures of the British Museum. The most striking feature, however, of Walker's genius was its elasticity; for, as time went on, we find that, whilst adhering to his classical method, he became more and more the interpreter of Nature. The interval between his first important work, "The Bathers," exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1867, and "The Old Gate," which was hanging on its walls after the artist's death, in 1875, marks the limits of his powers. Of the former, there is, unfortunately, no drawing or reproduction in Mr. Dunthorne's Gallery; but of the "Old Gate" there is an admirable highly finished drawing, and in it one can trace without difficulty the influence which Walker had not only over his own immediate followers, but over the whole course of English landscape art. In earlier works, such as the "Violet Field" (1867), "Stobhall Gardens" (1869), "The Old Farm Garden" (1871), Walker seemed to be content with portraying graceful figures surrounded by careful studies of flowers, most delicately treated, and with an effect to that time scarcely known in English art. Mr. Walker's next stage was that marked by such works as the "Rainy Day" (1871), "Our Village" (1872), in which we see the germs of poetry—already shown in the "Street at Cookham" (1866), with its flock of geese, and "The Well-Sinkers" (1868)—brought into greater prominence. It was, however, only in the last two years of his life that he in any way manifested the full extent of his resources. "The Harbour of Refuge" (1873-4) and "The Old Gate," will ever remain as his most distinctive works, and constitute his chief claim to his place as a leader of the school of poetic landscapists. It is easy to guess, from the various studies and drawings here collected, the care he bestowed upon "The Harbour of Refuge"—the garden of the old red-brick almshouses at Bray—over which the spirit of rest reigns supreme. These pictures, however, are so well known that it is not necessary to refer to them at length. Among the lesser known works collected by Mr. Dunthorne, some are very interesting, including a portrait (back view) of the late W. M. Thackeray, who was perhaps the first to divine Walker's talents, and who helped him much in his career. "Jane Eyre" was a character which seems to have had especial attraction for Walker; and, in the sketch of Rochester showing his mad wife, Walker touched, perhaps, for the first and only time the confines of the weird-like in his art—for the large unfinished sketches for his never-commenced picture, "The Unknown Land," can scarcely be regarded as purely imaginative. The earlier landscapes known as "The Plough" and "The Mushroom Gatherers," which belong to the period between 1868 and 1870, show Walker when the influence of François Millet and Corot first attracted him. These two are the only oil paintings in the exhibition. The rich sunset glow in the one, and the moonlight effect of the other, show to what Walker had risen at that comparatively early period of his career, and the sympathy with nature which had laid hold of the student of Greek classical art. The exhibition only contains about fifty sketches, and, although most interesting as a help to a just appreciation of Walker's work, it is no offence to Mr. Dunthorne to express the hope that, encouraged by his present success, he will, we hope, succeed in bringing together at some future time a still more complete collection of this gifted artist's works.

MESSRS. TOOTH'S GALLERIES.

The Spring Exhibition of pictures at Messrs. Tooth's Galleries (5 and 6, Haymarket) is a brilliant display of colour, in which foreign art plays an important part. Among Italian artists, Signori Cosenza, Fragiacomo, and Sorbi are fair exponents. Signor Favretto, in his genre treatment of an "Episode in Goldoni's Life" (99), aims somewhat higher; but the story is likely to be obscure to those who do not recall the poet's peculiarities. On the other hand, Signor Sorti's "Pallone" (132) ought to have more than a succès d'estime with athletes in search of some new outdoor game; whilst if the white dresses and powdered hair given by the artist are its indispensable adjuncts, the support of the æsthetes may be alike counted upon. Among other foreign artists, M. Jan Van Beers sends two little landscapes—"Near St. Germains" (19), a blue sky just invaded by pink-edged white clouds; and "Near Tontainville" (20), a grey-brown and lowering sky, but exquisitely lighted up by the sunlight, which falls from behind a cloud upon a bit of field. Far more remarkable are two scenes at "Guingamp" (55) and (62), by E. Sanchez Perrier, a Spaniard, if we mistake not, who has studied in Rome. Both little views are painted with microscopic fidelity in the full blaze of a noonday sun; but they succeed in rendering, without the least harshness or "brutality," the sharp outlines of the picturesque Breton houses. M. Eugène De Blaas' "Scandal" (40) is only a variation of his successful Academy work, "Secrets." The Piedmontese soldier has become the Venetian fisherman, and the three girls who are sitting round the doorway, affecting to be as busy with their fingers as with their tongues, have but little to distinguish them from those of the earlier work. One work by Gérôme, "Le Bain Maure" (109), a fine specimen of that archæological phase which possessed the artist a dozen years ago, due, perhaps, to the interest aroused in Paris by Mr. Alma Tadema's work, then more popular in France than in this country. His other and apparently more recent work, "In the Desert" (26), is an Arab seated on the sand, and beside him his dying horse. In spite of its low tone, a sense of scorching heat pervades the picture, and one can more easily fancy the thoughts of the Arab horseman than those of the more elaborately finished Arab girl just emerged from her bath. Roybet is represented by a strangely-painted single figure, "The Burgomaster" (70), and Israels by a lighter and less mournful subject than his wont—a father and son wading on shore "Returning from the Boats" (71), of which the only demerit is its rough, unfinished appearance.

Among the English artists, the most noteworthy are, perhaps, the least conspicuous; and some of them, like F. D. Hardy, E. Sainsbury, E. Crofts, and even Mr. J. Brett, seemed to have exercised almost as much skill in reducing their thoughts to cabinet size, as in conveying so much meaning in incident in so little space This is especially the case in Mr. Hardy's "Crash" (84), a domestic interior, telling its own story with microscopic fidelity; and in Mr. Sainsbury's "Calm" (46), a very poetic rendering of a dull, colourless sea sweltering under a hazy sun. Among the larger works, Mr. B. W. Leader's "Riverside Hamlet" (34) is a strongly-painted bit of shire scenery, with plenty of colour and sharpness of outline. It should be compared with the bright "Autumn Day" (78) of his brother Academician Mr. Vicat Cole (supposing Associates may claim brotherhood with one of the "Immortals"), and a fair idea will be obtained of the aims and methods of the older as contrasted with the younger landscapists of the day. Both may be regarded as realists; but their conceptions of nature are, it is clear, fundamentally opposed. In like manner, Mr. James Webb and Mr. Henry Moore may be taken as idealists in their treatment of nature; but one cannot help feeling that the latter's "Grey Day at Liphook" (47) conveys a real impression of the Hindhead district, whilst the former's rendering of "Liége" (21), for instance, cannot by any process of the imagination recall the smoke-begrimed Birmingham of Belgium. Mr. Burton Barber's "Little Kittens" (48), two children playing with an admirably painted kitten, shows not only a marked advance in technical power, but a greater freedom from that conventional sentimentalism which vulgarised some of his earlier works. Mr. Seymour Lucas sends an admirably executed and thoroughly humorous single figure, "The Exquisite" (75), a young "buck" of the last century, admiring himself and his new coat before a mirror. It is pleasant to find that an artist like Mr. G. B. O'Neill is still found to devote his talents to keeping alive the traditions of the old English school of which Collins, Mulready, and Webster were the last recognised exponents. His "Fourteenth of February" (115) is not only carefully painted, but has a pleasant healthy tone, which one finds repeated, but in broader and stronger tones, in Mr. John Burr's "Duty or Pleasure" (137), a boy watching beside the cradle of its crying brother, whilst his schoolfellows, with fife and drum, are parading the village street in the mock panoply of war.

Although the Continental school may be somewhat largely represented, we must not omit to add that, in addition to those referred to, it is supported by works of such artists as Van Haanen, Troyon, Sadée, and Rasch; whilst to the list of their English rivals should be added the names of G. H. Boughton, F. Dicksee, J. B. Burgess, Peter Graham, and others of less note but of not less promise.

FINE-ART SOCIETY'S GALLERY.

There has not been seen for a long time a more charming collection of water-colour drawings than that now on view at the Fine-Art Society's Gallery. Mr. Alfred Parsons is already well known as occupying a foremost place among painters of pastoral scenery, but hitherto his skill as a water-colour artist was known to a few. The present series of drawings illustrates more fully than any other artist has attempted the course of "Shakspeare's River," from its rising in Naseby Field until it mingles its waters with those of "Sabrina fair," near Tewkesbury. Mr. Parsons, however, is too true a poet to allow himself to be drawn away for any length of time from the central attraction of the Avon—Stratford and its immediate surroundings, Stoneleigh Deer Park, Guy's Cliffe, Charlecote, and Luddington, all of which are more or less closely associated with the Poet's life, or inspired him with thoughts which, by the help of the artist's brush, it is easy, even at this distance, to seize. It is difficult to convey in words an adequate idea of Mr. Parsons' charm. He has succeeded in the very difficult task of not only following the windings of this beautiful river, but has had the taste or good fortune to represent it in all seasons, and under the ever-varying conditions of an English climate. For instance, the view of "Pershore Church" (6) gives us an idea of one of the most fertile spots in England—

> When proud-pied April, dressed in all his trim,
> Hath put a spirit of youth in everything.

The tall spire stands out sharp in the rain-cleared atmosphere; whilst in the foreground is an apple-tree, half hiding the landscape with its mass of delicately tipped blossoms. "Stratford Church" (11), on the other hand, is first set in the full blaze of autumnal tints,

> When yellow leaves, or none, or few do hang;

and when the rising river tempts the angler to try his luck at the lock pool. But Mr. Parsons reverts again to the spot where Shakspeare's bones are still laid, and shows us their shrine—and around it "Old December's bareness everywhere." It is somewhat invidious to pick out any particular works by an artist who so uniformly shows almost equal care and sympathy in every scene on which he delights to dwell; but it is not amiss to mention amongst the most attractive "Cleeve Mill" (41), and the weir and rushing river at the same spot (39), "The Old Avon Bridge at Tewkesbury" (47), "Guy's Cliff Mill" (16)—perhaps the gem of the collection, with its glistening water reflecting innumerable rays of light and colour—"Tewkesbury Tower" (12), and "Warwick Castle" (27). Amongst the smaller studies of hedge and thicket and riverside, attention cannot fail to be attracted by "The Hawthorns" (46) and (10), "The Ranks of Osiers" (14), the rich "total gules" of the autumn-touched maple, and the gnarled roots of "Shakspeare's Oak" (49), where "earth-delving conies keep."

In addition to the fifty water colours, there are a dozen or so studies in black and white, illustrative of the neighbourhood of Stratford, and showing Mr. Parson's powers as an accomplished draughtsman. A word, moreover, should be added with reference to the catalogue to the exhibition. Mr. Parsons therein relates briefly and pleasantly how he first came to know "Shakspeare's river," and he illustrates his notes on people and places by numerous sketches, which give additional interest to what may with truth be called a "model guide-book" to the river Avon.

The Exhibition of the Society of Lady Artists (53, Great Marlborough-street) is in many ways worthy of a visit; and if the standard of the works exhibited is not the very highest, a very large proportion of them show promise and taste. The society has now been in existence about eleven years; and, owing to the indefatigable energy and liberality of its original promoter, Miss M. Atkinson (the honorary secretary), has perhaps done more for the advancement of women's work than one half of the associations which labour less unobtrusively in the same field. One cannot fail to be struck at the very inadequate prices (judged by the ordinary standard) which the ladies affix to their works, or to recognise that their competition must, in the long run, exercise a very appreciable influence upon the profits of all but the very best or most popular men artists. It is not possible to go through in any detail the six or seven hundred works exhibited in the room; and we must content ourselves by naming a few of the ladies whose pictures seem to show the greatest promise. Amongst the oil pictures, Miss Bertha Newcombe's "Evening" (91), Miss Mabel Moultrie's "High Jinks" (286), a group of kittens at play, Miss E. J. Week's "Feeding Pets" (348), and Miss Louisa Starr's "Portrait of a Boy" (658), are all worthy of a place in any exhibition. But it is in water colours that the ladies are especially strong; and foremost amongst these are Miss K. Macaulay, who has at least a dozen capital works, the best of which are her seapieces; Miss Melicent Grove, who contributes a number of French—chiefly Breton—landscapes, marked by a very delicate sense of colour; Miss Freeman Kempson, who excels in Scotch moorland and loch scenery; Miss Helen O'Hara, whose "Wind and Waves" (172) is one of the most striking studies in the rooms; Mrs. Murray Cookesley's "Egyptian Duett" (257), and Miss Nora Davison's "Summer Day at Twickenham" (709). Flower painting is also much in vogue amongst the ladies; and in this line Miss Hepburn, Miss Marianne Spencer, Miss E. M. Merrick, and Mrs. Barnard are clever executants. A special word of praise should also be accorded to Miss Hene Wheelwright's paintings on ivory—a charming group of miniatures—which suggest the hope that an almost forgotten and neglected branch of art may be revived, and occupy its rightful place.

Messrs. Hollender and Cremetti, who have become the lessees of the Hanover Gallery, inaugurate their tenancy by an exhibition of foreign works of art, of which, if we mistake not, the majority have already been seen in Paris, Brussels, and elsewhere. This, however, far from detracting from the interest of the collection here made, renders it interesting, as showing what is being done amongst our neighbours. Possibly, there are no works of first-rate merit, but there are many which will take a high place in the second "flight." The two most prominent works are a full-length portrait of the late Prince Imperial and a small head of the present Pope, by Campotosto, the latter executed with miniature-like delicacy, whilst that of the Prince is bold and broad. Of more general interest, however, are two drawings by Millet, and a "Study of the Thames" (155), by Bastien Le Page, giving a good idea of the suspended movement one may find on an early summer's morning at the very busiest part of the river. There is also an excellent specimen of Jan Van Beer's work, "True till Death" (40), an old pedlar who has lain down to die in the snow, with no one near him but his dog. Amongst the other names which appear in the catalogue are those of Meissonier, E. Frère, Feyen Perrin, Rosa Bonheur, and, of course, there are works which are ascribed to Th. Rousseau, Daubigny, Corot, Duez, and even to Courbet; but in the last case we must express grave doubts as to the authenticity of the "Château of Chillon" (150), attributed to that revolutionary artist. However sceptical one may be as to the works of all the French artists collected by Messrs. Hollender and Cremetti, there is no reason to doubt that those of the Belgian artists—Teneckat, Blommers, De Penne, and many others are genuine. In many instances, they are fairly representative works, and as such cannot be without interest to English picture-lovers.

At the Burlington Gallery (27, Old Bond-street) there is on view a small collection of water-colour drawings, of which some few show considerable merit. Mr. A. W. Weedon, the artist, studies in the very best of schools—that of Nature; and his rendering of Highland scenery shows that he is a careful observer and an intelligent interpreter of her moods. Mr. Weedon is at his best in rendering general effects, and especially such scenes as "Summer Twilight" (10) on Loch Mara, and "Evening After Rain" (26), on Loch Fine, and "Mountain Solitude" (28). He is less successful in dealing with tumbling mountain streams, where both the foaming water and the glistening rocks seem to present difficulties which he, in common with many more distinguished water-colour painters, have found almost insuperable.

Mr. R. W. Allan, whose water-colour drawings are now on view at Messrs. Dowdeswell's (137, New Bond-street), recalls by his apparently restlessness that ardent schoolmaster "who whipped his pupils out of England into France, out of France into Spain, and then he whipped them back again." It is difficult to follow the moods of this indefatigable "earth-trotter." From "Elgin Cathedral" (1) he jumps to "St. Mark's at Venice" (2), and from "Thames Barges" (6) to the "Courtyard of the Alhambra" (8). At one moment he is watching the "Arrival of the Fishing-boats at Tréport" (46), and at another assisting in a bakehouse (10) at the drawing of the oven. There is no want of "go" in Mr. Allan's style, but it wants finish and variety. He depends too much upon rapid effects and first impressions, and finds or thinks he sees too persistently, in all climates and under all conditions, the monotonous tones of an "East hauze."

The collection of pictures, miniatures, and enamels belonging to the late Mr. Henry G. Bohn, of which the sale by Messrs. Christie, which began on Thursday and will continue for the greater part of next week, is the first of the great sales of the season. The pictures are chiefly those of the Dutch and of the French schools of the last century, and mostly of cabinet size. Very few, however, are of very great interest or merit, except one by Chardin and two or three by Greuze. But it was rather on the collection of miniatures and enamels that Mr. Bohn prided himself, and with some reason. Amongst these, the French works of Isabey, Dumont, and Fragonard are the most noteworthy. There is also a fine collection of English miniatures, especially the Royal portraits, and some excellent specimens of the enamels of the two Bones, of whom one only reached the dignity of Academician, although the merits of the two have been variously estimated.

Messrs. Heywood Hardy and Charles Robertson have been elected Associates of the Society of Painters in Water Colours.

The Ansidei Raphael (of which we gave an Engraving last week) has arrived in London, and will be exhibited at the National Gallery.

A portrait, by Mr. H. Herkomer, of Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart., M.P., has been presented to his only daughter, Mrs. Williams Wynn, by the members of the Wynnstay Hunt.

The Prince of Wales, who will be the guest of Mr. Chaplin, M.P., at Blankney, during the Lincoln Spring Meeting, has, on the invitation of the Mayor of Lincoln, consented to lay the first stone of a School of Science and Art in that city.

The Prince of Wales has fixed the date of the costume ball of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours for Tuesday, May 19, and has signified his intention to be present, accompanied by the Princess and Prince Albert Victor.

The fund for presentation of a portrait to the Bishop of Peterborough now exceeds £500. The painting has been executed by Mr. F. Holl, R.A., and will appear in the summer exhibition of the Royal Academy.

It is announced that a fine half-length portrait by Gainsborough of Mrs. Hibbert, of Chalfont, shown in the Exhibition of Old Masters at Burlington House, which closed last Saturday, has been sold at 10,000 guineas.

A bazaar is announced for May next at the National Industrial Home for Crippled Boys, Woolsthorpe House, Kensington, to pay off the remaining expense of the new buildings, without doing which the committee cannot complete the home, by receiving twenty additional boys who await admission, and for whom they have accommodation. The bazaar is under the patronage of Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne).

M. OLIVIER PAIN,
THE REPUTED FRENCH ASSISTANT OF THE MAHDI.

CHIEF ENGINEER OF LORD C. BERESFORD'S STEAMER ON THE NILE.

BOMBAY STAFF CORPS.

OLIVIER PAIN.

Rumours of what goes on in the Mahdi's camp are of a mythical complexion; but some French journalists have, during several months past, asserted that a former well-known colleague of their own, M. Olivier Pain, is acting either in a military or diplomatic capacity, having become a Mussulman, in the service of the warlike religious Dictator of the Soudan insurrection. His imaginary exploits have been made the theme of a burlesque-dramatic performance at one of the Parisian theatres. This adventurous Frenchman was at New York ten years ago, when the photograph was taken, by Mora, from which his Portrait is engraved. He is now about forty years of age. In 1871, at the time of the Commune, he took an active part in the desperate struggle to overthrow social order, and was sentenced, with many others, to penal servitude in the island of New Caledonia. He escaped with Rochefort and four others, in 1874, and then went to America; but, on the outbreak of the last war between Russia and Turkey, M. Olivier Pain turned up in the East, and was private secretary to Osman Pasha during the siege of Plevna. He was sent to Russia as a prisoner of war, and when released was allowed to return to Paris, where he engaged in work as a journalist, under the patronage of M. Rochefort. The disturbances in Egypt, in 1882, attracted him to that country, and gave him employment in writing against the Khedive and the British intervention. It is believed that he has latterly been in the Soudan, and that he joined the Mahdi in Kordofan before the advance of the insurgents to Khartoum; but there is no sure testimony concerning his exercise of any special talents as a military commander. There is reason to suppose that several Europeans, who have had more or less experience of war in different countries, are attached to the Mahdi's army.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.—SIR REDVERS BULLER'S RETREAT FROM METAMMEH TO KORTI: THE ENEMY PURSUING AND ATTACKING AT ABOU KLEA WELLS.

SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. MELTON PRIOR (ASSISTED BY LIEUTENANT WALTER H. INGRAM)

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

Our Illustrations continue to show the history of the late campaign on the Nile, which has been succeeded by temporary inactivity so far as Lord Wolseley's army is concerned. We were enabled last week, by the assistance which Colonel Sir Charles Wilson rendered to our Special Artist, to present correct Sketches of the scene on Jan. 28, when Sir Charles, with his two armed steam-boats, approached within sight of Khartoum, and engaged in a conflict with the enemy's fort at Omdurman and the battery and large bodies of troops on Tuti Island; and of the situation of Sir Charles Wilson's party two days later, after the wreck of their second vessel, when they landed on the small island of Mernat (or Mernat) from which they were relieved by Lord Charles Beresford's steamer, with the Naval Brigade, and were brought down safely to the camp at Gubat. Lieutenant Walter H. Ingram, of the Middlesex Yeomanry Cavalry, who was on board the steamer Sofia, commanded by Lord Charles Beresford, has contributed materials for the Coloured Engraving which makes our Extra Supplement this week. It represents the steamer, manned by British sailors and soldiers, in conflict with the battery of two guns, and the crowds of riflemen, posted by the enemy on the river-bank, three miles below the island where Sir Charles Wilson and his companions awaited their rescue. Lord Charles Beresford replied to their fire with his Gardner machine-gun, which three of the bluejackets are seen working, behind its iron shield, in our Illustration, while the soldiers of the Mounted Infantry Corps, in the stern part of the vessel, plied their rifles at a range of five hundred yards. The Sofia had almost got past the enemy when a round shot from the battery on shore entered her side and pierced a hole in the boiler. A dense cloud of steam poured out, which was seen afar off by Sir Charles Wilson; and he, thinking that the boiler had burst, and that the steamer could not come up nearer to him, instantly moved his party, with their guns and stores, from the island to the right bank of the river, and marched down towards where the steamer lay. But Lord Charles Beresford's steamer was fortunately not permanently disabled; having anchored a short distance above the enemy's battery, the work of repairing the boiler was at once begun, in spite of the guns on shore, by the chief engineer, Mr. Henry Benbow, whose courage and prompt industry on this occasion deserve the highest praise. We are happy to give the Portrait of Mr. Benbow; and to observe that, when he arrived with the rest of the advanced force at Korti, Lord Wolseley's headquarters, the General Commanding-in-Chief publicly thanked him and applauded his gallantry, which few combatant officers, either of the Army or Navy, could have excelled.

The retreat, in February, of the advanced force originally commanded by Sir Herbert Stewart, and afterwards by Sir Redvers Buller, when it left the camp at Gubat, near Metammeh, to return by way of Abou Klea and Gakdul across the Bayuda Desert to Korti, is the subject of two Illustrations. The first—in drawing which our Special Artist, who had returned to Korti some days before, was assisted by Lieutenant Walter Ingram, as an eye-witness of the affair, who made a sketch of it—represents the enemy, on Feb. 16, attacking the fortified encampment of British troops at Abou Klea. The men of the Royal Irish Regiment, with their officer, are seen in front, defending the earthen rampart to the east; in the middle distance, 200 yards back, is the fort, a square platform of earthworks surrounded by a ditch, in which the horses were sheltered, and by a "zereba" of heaped-up thorn-bushes, held by the Naval Brigade, with two Gardner guns at corners of the platform; to the left of this is another zereba, inclosing the hospital, which is protected on three sides by ramparts built of piled commissariat boxes, and surmounted by the red cross flag. The hills in the back ground are occupied by the enemy firing into the British camp; to the left, 1200 yards distant, is the enemy's fort, which kept up a damaging fire; to the right, on a detached hillock, is a big gun of the enemy's, which fired only four rounds, and one of its shells is seen bursting on the ground outside the fort. The British force numbered altogether 1675 officers and men, consisting of a troop of the 19th Hussars, the Guards and Mounted Infantry of the Camel Corps, the Royal Sussex Regiment, the Royal Irish Regiment, the Naval Brigade, the Royal Artillery with four guns, the Commissariat Store and Medical Departments, and some two hundred of Gordon's native troops from the Khartoum steamers. A letter in the Daily Telegraph of last Wednesday, from the Special Correspondent of that journal, gives an account of Sir Redvers Buller's retirement from Gubat and defence of the camp at Abou Klea. Our Special Artist, Mr. Melton Prior, went out from Korti to meet the returning column after it had left Gakdul, and made a Sketch of its appearance on the march when passing the wells of Magrega and Meljik, between Gakdul and El Howeiyat.

We are indebted to Lieutenant Beverley Ussher, of the South Staffordshire Regiment, for an excellent Sketch of the battle fought on Feb. 10 at Kerbekan (opposite Dulka Island) by the force of General Earle, which went up the Nile from Korti, and which was to have proceeded to Abou Ahmed, if not to Berber, if circumstances had not prevented the execution of Lord Wolseley's plans. This conflict, in which the troops engaged were the 38th (South Staffordshire) and the 42nd (Black Watch) Royal Highlanders, unfortunately cost the lives of Major-General W. Earle, Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, commanding the first-named regiment, and Lieutenant-Colonel Coveny, commanding the Black Watch; but only six or seven others were killed on our side, and about forty wounded, among these Colonel Wauchop, Lieutenant Kennedy, Captain Horsburgh, and Lieutenant Colborne. The enemy were driven off the rocks which there overhang the bank of the Nile, losing nearly three hundred killed, and probably about nine hundred wounded, the rest escaping across the river; the fight lasted from nine in the morning to half-past one in the afternoon.

The whole force of both columns, that of Sir Redvers Buller and that commanded since General Earle's death by General Brackenbury, having returned to Korti, the campaign which began early in January is now at an end. It has proved an entire failure; and Lord Wolseley's army now stands just where it stood last Christmas, not at all nearer than it was either to Khartoum or to Berber, or to Abou Ahmed and the command of the Desert route from Korosko. The Mahdi has, on the contrary, achieved a great success, and has gained the mastery of the Nile, from Merawi upward, and of the whole country beyond the Bayuda Desert. No political or military advantage seems to have been secured on our side by the late operations in the Soudan, which have cost thousands of lives, and have been fatal to some of the best officers in our Army.

The new campaign, that of Sir Gerald Graham on the Red Sea coast around Souakim, where he was fighting Osman Digna just a twelvemonth ago, is not unlikely to commence this week. A camp has been formed at Souakim, inclosed by three sides of a parallelogram, the right resting on the sea and the left on the town. The left face follows a line drawn to the east and west from Osman's garden to a point midway between the water forts. The troops are posted in the following order:—Facing south, commencing at the garden, are Hodson's Horse, the 28th Bombay, the 13th and 17th Bengal, and in rear the 20th Hussars, the Mounted Infantry, and the 5th Lancers. Turning the angle, and facing west, are the Surrey, Shropshire, and Berkshire Line Regiments, and the Coldstream, Scots, and Grenadier Guards. Turning the angle, facing north, are the Horse Artillery, the Mounted Infantry, the Royal Engineers, the Marine Artillery, and the Marines. The head-quarters and field hospital are in the centre. When the advance is made, all the regiments will be represented. It is expected that the first movement would be the occupation of Handab by the British troops, probably on Thursday of the present week; and some fighting may have taken place before this paper comes into the hands of our readers. We are indebted to a naval officer of H.M.S. Dolphin, at Souakim, for a Sketch of the zereba and advanced redoubt, on the plain four miles from the town, at the present termination of the pioneer railway constructed by the Royal Engineers. It is nearly opposite the position held by Osman Digna at Hasheen. The redoubt is a small one, square, the lower part built of sand-bags, the upper storey of planks, with a look-out box raised above, to observe the enemy's approach; the whole surrounded by a ditch and a zereba of bushes, behind which are two Krupp guns.

There was no important military news this week, to the date of the present writing, on Wednesday evening. The chief political incident is the arrest of Zebehr Pasha and his two sons in Egypt, and their deportation to Cyprus, with the seizure of papers showing that they were in treasonable correspondence with the Mahdi.

THE LATE COLONEL WALLER, V.C.

A distinguished officer, who won the Victoria Cross by his conspicuous gallantry at the capture of the fortress of Gwalior in June, 1858, died on the 29th ult., at his residence in Bath, Colonel William F. F. Waller, late of the 25th Bombay Native Infantry, and of the Bombay Staff Corps, saw much active service in India, being present at the siege and storming of Chandaree and Jhansi, at the battle of the Betwa, and at the capture of Calpee. At Gwalior, he and Lieutenant Rose, who was killed in this action, with a mere handful of men attacked the fortress, climbing upon the roof of the house, shooting the enemy's gunners, and carried all before them. He was then a very young officer, having entered the service only the year before; and his death has occurred in the forty-fifth year of his age.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Mr. C. Hawkins, Bath.

THE LATE SURGEON C. P. TURNER

Mr. Charles Palmerston Turner, Surgeon to the 19th Hussars, died of dysentery at Korti on the 6th inst., to the regret of all in camp who knew him. He was thirty-four years of age, and had seen service in India; in the Jowaki expedition of 1877 and 1878; in the Afghan War, with the Peshawur Field Force, at the capture of Ali Musjid, when he was mentioned in despatches, and obtained the medal with clasps; in Egypt, at the battle of Tel-el-Kebir; and in the Souakim expedition of last year, at the battle of El Teb, where he was slightly wounded, and at the battle of March 14 at Tamasi. He was a favourite with all ranks, and a skilful surgeon.

The Portrait is from a photograph by P. Sebah, Cairo.

THE LATE MR. CAMPBELL, OF ISLAY.

As one of the fine old race of Highland lairds, and a gentleman of considerable scientific and literary accomplishments, Mr. John Campbell, of Islay, who died at Cannes on the 17th ult., merits some public notice. He was sixty-three years of age. He was son of Mr. Walter F. Campbell, of Islay, M.P. for Argyllshire; his mother was Lady Eleanor Charteris, daughter of the seventh Earl of Wemyss. The island estate of Islay had been sold by his father, and the family resided in France till 1855, when, on the father's death, they removed to London. Mr. John Campbell was called to the Bar, but never practised; he was private secretary to the Duke of Argyll, his cousin and intimate friend, when his Grace was Lord Privy Seal in 1853; and he was afterwards Secretary to the Board of Health, to the Mines' Commissioners, and to the Lighthouse Commissioners; from 1874 to 1880 he was a Groom-in-Waiting of the Queen's Household. He travelled extensively, was a Fellow of the Geological Society, studied optics and astronomy, invented the heliometer in use at Greenwich Observatory, and contributed to the meteorological apparatus at the observatory on Ben Nevis. He bestowed much attention on the improvement of the condition of the peasantry in his native country, who were greatly attached to him. He was familiar with the Gaelic language, and his book, "Popular Tales of the West Highlands," is a work of much interest. In private life, and in general society, Mr. Campbell of Islay was highly esteemed.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Maull and Fox, of Piccadilly.

NEW BUILDINGS OF THE "DAILY NEWS."

Our Illustration shows these buildings, which are practically in two blocks, having a frontage to Bouverie-street of 85 ft., and five storeys in height, including the basement and a storey in the roof. The buildings are constructed throughout of red brick with red Mansfield-stone dressings. The architectural style is broad in treatment, with large lighting power. The front building is occupied on the ground floor by the publishing and general offices, the first floor by the management and editorial department, and the upper floors by the printing and other offices. The rear building is wholly occupied by the printing offices, paper stores, machine-room, stereotyping department, and engine-rooms. The sanitary arrangements, the ventilation, and the fire-proof division of the premises, have been carefully studied. One feature in the execution of the work has been that the printing of the paper has not been intermitted for one day during the reconstruction of the building, while the new buildings have been erected over the printing-machines. The buildings have been constructed from designs prepared by Mr. Thomas Chatfeild Clarke, F.R.I.B.A., and under his superintendence; the works were carried out by Messrs. Brown, Son, and Blomfield, in a very short space of time. The ornamental carving, which presents heads of Milton, Johnson and Goldsmith, Dickens, Forster, and Douglas Jerrold, was executed by Mr. Anstey; and the ironwork was supplied by Messrs. H. Young and Co.

A shilling pamphlet which is published by Messrs. W. Blackwood and Sons, entitled "Khartoum as I Saw It," by Colonel J. A. Grant, C.B., F.R.S., gives the most vivid and animated description of that city and its inhabitants, as they were at the time of the author's visit, in April, 1863. Colonel Grant, the companion of Captain Speke in the memorable exploring journey from the East Coast of Africa to Lake Victoria Nyanza and down the White Nile, reached Khartoum on March 29 of that year, and stayed there till April 16; his notes of the subsequent Nile voyage to Berber, with his valuable observations along the river-banks, from Khartoum to Abou Ahmed, were recently quoted in this Journal; and we were indebted to him for several useful Sketches, engraved by us a few weeks ago. He furnished last year to the proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society a further account of the route march, with camels, from Berber to Korosko, to which we may probably have future occasion to refer. The portion of his journal now published, relating his sojourn in the city of Khartoum, has a particular interest at this moment, and presents a lively and entertaining picture of the strangely mixed social condition of the Egyptian and European colony, long before an insurrection in the Soudan was apprehended, as well as the more permanent aspects of the locality, to which public attention has of late been so painfully directed. This publication is adorned with eight or nine Engravings, from Colonel Grant's own Sketches and from photographs supplied by the London Stereoscopic Company, which have appeared in our pages, representing the town from different points of view, looking up the Blue Nile, and looking down the Blue Nile, the Palace or Government House, the Fort and Barracks, the site of Omdurman, at the junction of the Blue with the White Nile, two miles below the city, the head of the Sixth Cataract, with Mount Rooeeyan, about sixty miles from Khartoum, and the Fort of Abou Hamed (or Ahmed), all which may be in the recollection of our readers. The author tells us much, in the way of incidental anecdotes, concerning the habits and manners of various classes and races of people forming a very heterogeneous collection of mankind, civilised, semi-civilised, and barbarous, in that singular place; and there is amusement, not less than real information, to be got by perusing his brief personal narrative of a visit to Khartoum.

MUSIC.

SAVOY THEATRE.

For some years past a notable event of the London season has been the production of a new work in which the literary skill and refined humour of Mr. W. S. Gilbert, and the musical genius of Sir Arthur Sullivan have been associated with such happy results as have scarcely ever before been realised except by the co-operation of Scribe and Auber. It was first in "Box and Cox" and "The Contrabandista" and "Trial by Jury" that Sir Arthur (then Mr.) Sullivan indicated the possession of a vein of musical humour, piquant yet always artistic, which was much further developed in the pieces in which he and Mr. Gilbert subsequently co-operated—"The Sorcerer," "H.M.S. Pinafore," "The Pirates of Penzance," "Patience," "Iolanthe," and "Princess Ida." These later works, with the exception of the two last, were brought out at the Opéra Comique Theatre, in the Strand, under the able management of Mr. D'Oyly Carte.

Another success has now been added to those previously gained by the production, last Saturday evening, of a new result of the combined work of Mr. Gilbert and Sir A. Sullivan. This novelty is described as a "Japanese Opera," the title being "The Mikado; or, The Town of Titipu." The opera consists of two acts, in the first of which we find Nanki-Poo, the son of the Mikado, disguised as a wandering minstrel, a fugitive from the Court in order to avoid a compulsory marriage with the elderly Katisha. Ko-Ko, Lord High Executioner, has three wards, sisters, Yum-Yum, Pitti-Sing, and Peep-Bo, the first of whom is betrothed to him, but is in love with and beloved by Nanki-Poo, whose disregard of the Royal mandate has incurred the liability to death punishment, a month's interval being allowed. He persuades Ko-Ko to permit his marriage with Yum-Yum, who, when a widow, can become the wife of Ko-Ko. A difficulty arises when it is considered that the widow of a man who is executed is condemned to be buried alive. It is therefore arranged that a false certificate of the execution shall be presented to the Mikado, the two young lovers making their escape, which is intercepted by the arrival of the enamoured and furious Katisha. She is, however, soothed by the address of Ko-Ko, whom she accepts as her husband; the Mikado relents, and is appeased by discovering that his son still lives and is restored to him; and everything turns out pleasantly. This is but a slight outline of incidents that are made the medium of much genuine fun. The grotesqueness of Ko-Ko—who has been a "cheap tailor," who confesses to having been "taken from the county jail by a set of curious chances"—and the senility of the Mikado, with his eternal simper and rolling gait, are admirably realised, respectively, by Mr. G. Grossmith and Mr. R. Temple; their dialogue and songs being replete with humour. The inflated arrogance of Pooh-Bah, the monopolist of all the principal State dignities, is another, but less pronounced comic feature, this character having been also excellently filled by Mr. Rutland Barrington. Miss Leonora Braham was an attractive representative of Yum-Yum; Miss Jessie Bond, as Pitti-Sing, gave a charming realisation of the fascinating little coquette, sometimes demure, at others brimming over with vivaciousness; and Miss Sybil Grey was a good representative of the third sister, Peep-Bo. Miss Rosina Brandram was an excellent Katisha, by turns lachrymose and vengeful, without exaggeration. Mr. D. Lely, as Nanki-Poo, was a good sentimental lover, especially in the delivery of his music; and the part of Pish-Tush, one of the nobles of the Court, was well filled by Mr. F. Bovill. The costumes, scenery, and stage groupings (from native drawings) are in the highest degree beautiful and effective.

Sir Arthur Sullivan's music is—as might be expected from previous instances—bright and artistic throughout. The sentimental portions are replete with charming melody, and those with a comic purpose are piquant and brilliant while still being refined; his orchestral effects being, as always, full of interesting variety. In the chorus and march of the Mikado's troops the composer has very happily indicated a style of music widely differing from that of modern Europe. Many pieces will doubtless be popular, among them—the graceful chorus of female voices, "Comes a Little Train of Ladies"; the sprightly trio for the sisters, "Three Little Maids"; the beautiful bridal chorus, "Braid the Raven Hair"; the capital quartet, in madrigal style, "Brightly Dawns"; the five-part glee, "See how the Fates"; and Katisha's very expressive song, "Hearts do not break." Other numbers, too, will no doubt be sought for, and the whole work will be in request in drawing-room circles.

The performance on Saturday was in every respect admirable, including the important orchestral and choral details. Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted, and he, Mr. Gilbert, Mr. D'Oyly Carte (the manager), and the principal performers were called before the curtain. There is every prospect of a long run for "The Mikado."

"Irma," a romantic opera in three acts, was produced at St. George's Hall, Langham-place, on Tuesday evening. The English text is supplied by Mr. Sinclair Dunn, the original being by the composer of the music, Herr J. H. Bonawitz, who is a skilful pianist, and has produced many musical works, among them being a grand "Requiem" and a four-act opera entitled "Ostrolenka," which was brought out at St. George's Hall nearly a year ago. The scene of the book of "Irma" is laid in Hungary, the chief incidents being the loves of the heroine, a gipsy maiden, and Arany, a Hungarian hunter, his assassination by the jealous gipsy, Tomba, and the death of Irma and her father, Tisza—a somewhat crude and ultra-melodramatic plot. The music contains some clever and effective writing, both in the vocal and orchestral details; but has no marked individuality of style to give permanent interest to it. The chief merit in its performance on Tuesday was the singing of Madame Rose Hersee, who gave Irma's music with much effect alike in the lighter and the more tragic portions. The other characters were sustained by Mr. T. T. Moss (Tisza), Mr. Sinclair Dunn (Arany), and Mr. W. Fletcher (Tomba). There was a well-selected orchestra, and a small but efficient chorus. The composer conducted.

The second concert of the new season of the Philharmonic Society brought forward the overture which gained the prize of twenty guineas offered by the society. Eighty-eight works were sent in, and success fell to Mr. Gustav Ernest, who conducted the performance of his "Dramatic Overture" at last week's concert. The work answers well to its title, containing as it does some strong and effective climaxes and some good contrasts, both in style and orchestral variety. It was admirably played, as were the other pieces of the programme in which the band was concerned. Mr. Oscar Beringer, in Schumann's concerto in A minor, proved himself a pianist of the first order. In executive skill and artistic style it was an excellent performance. Madame Minnie Hauk sang with fine dramatic feeling a recitative and cavatina from Gounod's "La Reine de Saba," and a recitative and air from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew." Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted with the same efficiency as at the previous concert.

Gounod's "Redemption" again drew a vast audience to its repetition last week by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Barnby. The choral performance was throughout admirable, and Madame Valleria, Madame Patey, and Mr. Santley gave their solo music with the same excellence as in former instances; Mr. Lloyd having been replaced, in consequence of his illness, by Mr. Piercy, who acquitted himself well under the circumstances. In important passages for one of the narrators Mr. W. Mills gave fresh proof of progress. Miss B. Moore was the remaining solo vocalist.

The Guildhall School of Music gave a concert at the Mansion House on Saturday afternoon, under the direction of the Principal, Mr. Weist Hill. The performances of the students, vocal and instrumental, gave fresh evidence of the progress made by the course of instruction pursued at the institution, which now numbers about 2400 pupils.

Madame Viard-Louis' fifth and last Beethoven recital of the series took place at Prince's Hall this week.

Herr E. Mahr—a skilful violinist—gave a recital at Steinway Hall on Monday afternoon.

A special performance of Mr. Mackenzie's successful oratorio, "The Rose of Sharon," was announced for yesterday (Friday) evening, at St. James's Hall, Madame Albani taking the soprano part, the other principal vocalists being Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The composer came from Italy to conduct the oratorio.

An important celebration of the bicentenary of Bach's birth will be given at the Royal Albert Hall this (Saturday) afternoon by the Bach Choir, associated with Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir. The great Mass in B minor (Die Höhe Messe) will be performed, conducted by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, director of the Bach Choir.

The London Musical Society announce an entertainment for Wednesday evening next at St. James's Hall, the soloists being Miss Carlotta Elliot, Miss Alice Fripp, Miss Lena Little, Herr Von Zur-Mühlen, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike; and Mr. Barnby conducting.

German opera may possibly again have a hearing in London this summer, it being proposed to give six performances (in one week) of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," should a sufficient number of guarantors be found to form a fund to cover the risk of loss. The scheme is being promoted by Herr Hermann Franke, who was concerned in the management of the German opera performances at Drury-Lane Theatre in 1882. Should the project now referred to prove successful, it is in contemplation to give one of Wagner's operas in the same way every year.

Metzler's "Organo-Pianos" include the application of a very ingenious novelty, the invention of an Italian, the patent of which has been secured by the eminent firm above named. The action of a pedal sets in very rapid motion a set of very small hammers (placed behind the regular pianoforte-hammers), the incessant gentle action of which against the strings (so long as the pedal is used) causes a sustained sound resembling that of a sweet-toned wind-instrument. This may be used either independently of, or in conjunction with the pianoforte, and each hand may be used for either effect alone, thus allowing a sustained harmonic accompaniment with one hand in contrast to brilliant passages with the other. It is stated that the new invention can be applied to pianofortes of any kind.

The annual display of the German Gymnastic Society was held in the Gymnasium, Pancras-road, on Thursday.

We learn from Calcutta that the Legislative Council has adjourned sine die. Before the adjournment, the Viceroy emphatically denied that the Bengal Tenancy Bill had been hurried through with indecent haste or forced through by the dead weight of the official majority.

An influential deputation from the Sunday Society waited last Tuesday on the trustees of the National Gallery, and urged that that institution should be opened during certain hours on Sundays. It was stated that a majority of the trustees favour such a course, but that the decision rests with Parliament.

In London last week 2737 births and 1678 deaths were registered. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 173, and the deaths 154, below the average numbers in the corresponding weeks of the last ten years. The deaths included 22 from smallpox, 51 from measles, 7 from scarlet fever, 8 from diphtheria, 49 from whooping cough, and 14 from dysentery.

Fossil Botany formed the subject of a paper read by Mr. W. P. James on Monday evening at a meeting of the Victoria Institute. The paper was a careful resumé of the results of modern research, and contained a summary of the number of fossil plants discovered which had their counterparts in the botany of the present day, and remarked on the great absence of forms between any two species. Communications were read from Sir. R. Owen and Professor Hicks, F.R.S., congratulating the author on the value of his paper; and Professor Carruthers, F.R.S., Mr. S. R. Pattison, F.G.S., Dr. Walker, F.L.S., and others took part in the discussion.

A large gathering of the members of the Playgoers' Club, together with numerous invited guests, assembled last Tuesday at the club-rooms in Newman-street, Oxford-street, to hear a paper read by Mr. Clement Scott on the subject of "The Stage and the Age." Additional interest was imparted to the occasion by the circumstance that this was the anniversary night of the founding of this now flourishing society. Mr. Scott's lecture reviewed the history of our stage and dramatic literature since the commencement of the dramatic revival about twenty years since, and embraced an energetic protest against the apathy and cynical contempt of the frequenters of the stalls, whom the lecturer charged with being chiefly responsible for "that deadly curse which is the poison of all art—irreverence." It concluded with an earnest plea for the modern poetical drama, in the course of which the lecturer recited passages of verse from plays of Lord Tennyson, Mr. Wills, Mr. W. S. Gilbert, and the late Lord Lytton. The lecturer received a cordial welcome.

On Tuesday evening (St. Patrick's Day) Earl Cowper presided at the 102nd anniversary festival of the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick, and expressed his hope and belief that the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland would be a success in every way. Contributions amounting to £746 were announced, including the annual subscription of 100 guineas from her Majesty.—Mr. Parnell, M.P., presided in Westminster Townhall, at a Patrick's Day dinner, and in proposing "Ireland as a Nation" criticised severely the constitution of Irish Boards, and spoke with confidence as to the near success of the cause of Home Rule.—The usual St. Patrick's Ball was given at Dublin Castle by the Lord Lieutenant and Countess Spencer. There was a large attendance. A Nationalist ball was held in the Rotundo; the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress were present. There was also a National concert in the Antient Concert-Rooms.—The St. Patrick's Day celebrations in Ireland passed off without much disturbance, except at Portadown, where there was a collision between Protestants and Roman Catholics.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

There is probably no more difficult property in London to manage than the Empire Theatre. It is a beautiful building; one of the few theatres that is a distinct credit to a wealthy metropolis. Grand enough for a national opera-house, perfect for sound and spectacle, the kind of place that is envied by Art on the one side and by 'Arry on the other. Shall it be given over to music or the music-hall? That is the question. And it is a question not yet decided. Artistic society and vulgar smokers are at loggerheads on that point. The new entertainment exhibits the natural vacillation of the managerial mind. For "The Lady of the Locket" is not quite good enough for the cultured, and not quite bad enough for the mere lounger. As a spectacle, nothing more beautiful of its kind can be seen in London. The scenes are splendid; the Venetian pictures are as good as anything that has been presented at the much-vaunted Eden Theatre in Paris. The dresses might, pace Lewis Wingfield and the archæological Mr. Godwin, be the envy of Henry Irving and Wilson Barrett. But still the question remains, does the public want more of the voice and melody of Florence St. John or less of the active interference of J. L. Shine? Does it require less poetry and passion or more political jokes? Does it demand more wisdom from the Doge and the Council of Ten or fewer nightcaps and bedgowns? Mr. W. S. Gilbert has much to answer for. Solemn personages can never now be introduced on the stage without risk. The Doge, however gloriously attired, suggests a breakdown, and the Venetian council, however grim in physiognomy, calls for a cancan. The Gilbertian philosophy suggests ridicule of the most serious subjects. He has chaffed the soldiers, the police, the æsthetes, the judges, and—odi profanum vulgus—the House of Lords! The other day the representation of a Spanish play was spoiled by the introduction of a sententious judge. If Mr. Gilbert had never written the "Trial by Jury," the judge would not have been asked by the wags in the stalls to sing a patter song and to expound the Spanish legitimacy laws in jokes and jingle. The dramatic times are sadly out of joint when the vacant-faced young gentlemen in the Gaiety stalls arouse themselves from their lethargy to yell out "What cheer, 'Ilia," at the instigation of Miss Nelly Farren. No one appears to know what the "Lady of the Locket" will do. They all seem to agree that the book, by Mr. Hamilton, is as cleverly ponderous as such productions generally are; that the music, by Mr. Fullerton, is full of gentle recollections, with one or two charming and original numbers; that the singing and manner of Miss St. John are as charming as ever; and that a "young Santley" has been found in Mr. Haydn Coffin, who brings his funereal name to bear upon light comic opera. If ever a man deserved to change his name Mr. Coffin certainly did, for it as much allied to bronchitis as to burials. However, this handsome young actor has a career before him. He acts as well as he sings, which is a great recommendation. His "brindisi" in the second act was as well acted as it was sung; and if in the distant future we are to have a Ronconi as well as a Santley, all will be well.

"Mazeppa," as written by Mr. Frank Burnand and as acted at the Gaiety, is pronounced by the patrons of that characteristic place of entertainment as "awfully jolly, old chap." The young club men and the correctly dressed will crawl back to the Gaiety. For have they not in Mazeppa their inimitable Nelly Farren, who, without flattery, sings, dances, and acts better now than she did fifteen or sixteen years ago? Have they not their favourite droll Mr. Edward Terry, attired in fantastic clothes and singing wonderful songs? Is not their favourite Mr. Royce still on the scene? And, though unhappily they have lost those graceful actresses Miss Kate Vaughan and Miss Gilchrist, they have still a charming representative of the pretty side of burlesque in Miss Phyllis Broughton, and a clever little comedian in Miss Clara Jecks. But best of all—better, it would appear, than the melodies and songs and concerted music of Herr Meyer Lutz—has not Miss Bessie Bellwood condescended to "give permission" to the aristocratic Gaiety to sing her democratic ditty, "What cheer, 'Ilia"? This is indeed an honour. Whitechapel and Whitehall join hands over "What cheer, 'Ria." The Strand and Shadwell are in unity over this seductive screech. It was a great song at the music-halls. Miss Bessie Bellwood, the creatress of this intoxicating tune, dressed the famous 'Ria in character. She was a "down cast" maiden flashily attired, such as may be seen occupying a seat in a tax-cart on Sunday destined for Epping. The object of the song was that delight of the lower orders—noise. The more the "profanum vulgus" screams the merrier they become. The Gaiety takes the word from Miss Farren, and such a din is heard as never before echoed within the walls of this solemn place of mirth. Who shall foretell the future of "What cheer, 'Ria?" It has advanced to the halls of the "sacred lamp," and we may yet find it introduced into a "singing quadrille" at aristocratic balls in the season. A maddened room of dancers winding up the evening with a shout of "What cheer, 'Ria," would be eminently characteristic of the age in which we live.

Whatever may be thought of the merit or demerit of the Spanish play, "The Passion Flower," produced the other morning at the Olympic, there can be little question of the excellence of the acting of Miss Fanny Brough, who shows extraordinary power in pathetic situations, and should be encouraged to play bolder and more prominent characters than she has hitherto attempted. The daughter of Robert Brough has talent of no ordinary kind, and her success is very welcome when actresses of the first class are somewhat scarce. Mr. J. G. Grahame also played excellently, with fire, animation, and capital expression, in a bold, heroic character of a romantic pattern; and the performance all round was extremely creditable. C. S.

The emigration statistics of Ireland for 1884 show that the emigrants who left Irish ports last year were 76,043, a decrease of 32,873, as compared with 1883—the number of males being 38,177, and of females 37,866.

By forty-one votes to seventeen the Dublin Town Council resolved on Monday not to take any official part in the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales, while expressing the desire that no discourtesy should be offered to the Royal visitors.—Whilst the Corporation was discussing the subject, the Citizens' Reception Committee was engaged at the Chamber of Commerce in making further preparations for the reception of the Royal visitors.

A very complete and useful "Special Map, to Elucidate the Russo-Afghan Boundary Question," is published by Messrs. W. and A. K. Johnston. It shows, in minute detail, the whole of Afghanistan, with the adjacent parts of Turkestan, Persian Khorassan, Cashmere, the Punjaub, Scinde, and Beloochistan, differently coloured. Two smaller maps appear on the sheet; one indicating the successive conquests of the Russian Empire in Asia at five historical periods, and the other showing the British dominions all over the globe, with the distances from England. Messrs. W. and A. K. Johnston have also published similar shilling maps of the Soudan and of South Africa, specially designed to illustrate the political and military affairs of the present day.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, March 17.

Paris is assuming its springtide aspect; the trees seem to be sprinkled with green dust; the loungers are beginning to sit in the sun in the Champs Elysées and along the boulevards; the streets are radiant with flowers, piled up in perfumed and brilliant masses on innumerable hand-carts, and offering themselves in dainty bouquets on every door-step. The Parisians of the decadence adore flowers, and March is the great month when rich and poor alike celebrate the floral festival. And so, thanks to flowers, to the rejoicings and masquerades of the Mi-Carême, and above all to the sunny weather, the Parisians during the past week have seemed particularly gay and happy, and the innocent observer would never have suspected that France is passing through a series of crises, commercial, social, and political.

One has to go to the Chamber of Deputies or to read the party newspapers in order to realise this fact. The deputies are meditating a renewed conflict with the Senate on the Budget question, and continuing, in the matter of foreign cattle, the battle of Free Trade versus Protection which has just been fought once in the matter of cereals. Protection gained a first victory yesterday, when, by 273 votes to 216, a tax of 25f. a head was voted on imported oxen. The social crisis forces itself upon our attention, thanks to the recurrence of the anniversary of the Commune. To-morrow, March 18, ten grand banquets and innumerable "commemorative punches" will be held in the eighty districts of Paris. "The revolutionaries of the two hemispheres" are earnestly invited to attend these meetings, where "revolutionary orators" of various shades and parties will speak "in celebration of the most glorious date of the nineteenth century." So say the posters which cover the walls of Paris, and on which the survivors of the Commune boldly inscribe their names and addresses, and glory in their political past. The Anarchists had talked of organising a grand public meeting on the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville, on March 20; but it is not likely that it will take place, for the Government has promised the pardon of Louise Michel, Kropotkine, Gautier, Crié, and a score other political prisoners belonging to the Anarchist party; and any disturbance would naturally prevent the realisation of this official promise.

The Ballerich affair has been occupying the attention of the lovers of the sensationalism of the criminal courts. Gamahut, the leader of the band of precocious scoundrels who murdered Madame Ballerich, has been condemned to death, and his accomplices to long terms of imprisonment. M. Charles Ballerich, who was tried for an armed invasion into the offices of the Cri du Peuple newspaper, has been acquitted. Public opinion has declared itself very strongly in favour of M. Ballerich, who so violently took justice into his own hands, and his law expenses have been paid by a public subscription which was covered in a few days.

Two more picture exhibitions have been opened this week: one of the works of Bastien Lepage, and the other "Blanc et Noir," a new society founded on the model of the English Black and White Exhibition. In the new annexe of the Ecole des Beaux-Arts, on the Quai Malaquais, is exhibited nearly the complete life-work of the young master who died three months ago in the prime of life. Bastien Lepage is the most uncompromising and thorough of the painters of the modern French naturalist school, and by a large section of the young students of the day he is accepted as the impeccable master. The exhibition of his collected works shows him to best advantage as a portraitist whom temperament caused to observe and work in the manner of Clouet. He is an implacable analyst and an indefatigable observer of the particularities of the human physiognomy. In his landscapes and figure compositions, such as the "Potato Gatherers," the "Père Jacques," "The Beggar," "Les Foins," he applies to nature the processes which served him in his portraits, and he has painted portraits of trees and even of blades of grass. Here we see the weakness of the "naturalist" theory of painting: carried out logically, it annihilates the personality of the artist. The ideal "naturalist" painter would be one who had attained the exactitude of photography in colours, supposing such photography possible. T. C.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated April 22, 1884) of Mr. Thomas Dyer Edwardes, late of No. 5, Hyde Park-gate, Kensington, who died on Jan. 5 last, was proved on the 26th ult. by Barclay Fielder Watson, John Ellman Brown, and William Noel Tonkins, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £214,000. The testator bequeaths £20,000 New Three per Cents, upon trust, for each of his daughters—Mrs. Mary Dyer Ledgard, Mrs. Elizabeth Sarah Reeves, and Mrs. Sophia Anne Reeves; £60,000 Consols, upon trust, for his son, Thomas Dyer Edwardes, for life, and then for his said three daughters; £1000 each to his nephews, William Edwards Sharp and the Rev. Alfred John Begbie, and his executor Mr. Brown; £500 to his executor Mr. Tonkins; £150 to his executor Mr. Watson; and he states he does not number his will with legacies to charitable institutions, as he has always given them a percentage of his income in his lifetime. The residue of his property he leaves to his said son.

The will (dated Dec. 12, 1877), with four codicils (dated Dec. 28, 1881; April 26, 1882; and Sept. 15 and Dec. 29, 1884), of Mr. Alfred Tylor, late of No. 42, Newgate-street, engineer and brass founder, and of Shepley House, Carshalton, who died on Dec. 31 last, was proved on the 3rd inst. by Mrs. Isabella Tylor, the widow, Mrs. Juliet Mary Morse, the daughter, and William Leatham Bright, the son-in-law, three of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £137,000. The testator gives his freehold house at Mayfield, Sussex, certain furniture and effects, £8000, and an annuity of £2500 to his wife; and his farm, Upper Cowden, Mayfield, Sussex, he settles upon his daughter, Juliet Mary. He bequeaths 1 per cent of his personal estate, after payment of his debts, and also 1 per cent of his freehold property, when sold, to the London School Board, to be invested, and the rent and interest applied yearly to the foundation and support of one or of a number of scholarships for boys and girls for three years, from the ages of thirteen to sixteen, to be chosen, in preference, out of the Board School in Harp-alley or Fetter-lane, of which he had been secretary for twenty years, at the discretion of the School Board; and in case of difficulty in finding proper scholars in these schools, then out of some other Board School. The scholarships are to be held by boys attending the City of London or University College Schools, or University College, of which he was a governor, or any other schools for boys of a similar high class, or any schools for the higher education of girls that the School Board may select. A similar 1 per cent upon his personal and freehold property is left to the School Board for Carshalton to be applied in the purchase of a field or fields for a recreation or cricket ground as near to the village as possible, and in the formation of a fund to provide a caretaker, for the use of the youth of Carshalton. He also bequeaths £100 each to the Invalid Home, Stamford-hill; the North-Eastern Hospital for Children; the Friends' Meeting, Bishopsgate; the Friends' Meeting, Stoke Newington; and the Friends' Meeting, Croydon; and some other legacies. As to the residue of his real and personal estate, he leaves one half between his sons, Joseph John Tylor and Alfred Edward Tylor, and the other half between his daughters, Juliet Mary, Alberta Louisa Helen, Isabella McIvor, and Mary Delamere.

The will (dated Oct. 31, 1883), with a codicil (dated Nov. 29 following), of Mr. William Overend, Q.C., late of Lincoln's-inn, and of West Retford House, Retford, Nottinghamshire, who died on Dec. 24 last, was proved at the Nottingham district registry on the 6th ult. by John Edward Barker, the nephew, Charles Stanley, and William Wake, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £87,000. The testator bequeathes his horses, carriages, furniture, pictures, plate, books and effects (excepting a picture specifically bequeathed) to his wife, Mrs. Maria Overend; £100 each to the Sheffield General Infirmary and the Sheffield School of Art; £50 each to the Sheffield Girls' Charity School and the Sheffield Boys' Charity School; annuities of £300 each to his sisters, Mrs. Hannah Barker and Mrs. Elizabeth Lefroy; £1000 each to his nephews, John Overend Rose, Overend George Rose, and Richard Overend Rose; £1000 to his butler, Charles Roberts; £500 to his former clerk, Edward Joseph Watts; and other legacies. As to the remainder of his real and personal estate, he leaves £1000 and one seventh of the residue to, or upon trust for, each of his nephew and nieces, John Edward Barker, Helen Barker, Mina Ruth Gambier, Josephine Mary Caffin, and Janet S. Johnstone; and one seventh of the said residue, upon trust, for each of his nieces, Annie Rose and Elizabeth Frances Rose,

The will (dated Nov. 20, 1877), with a codicil (dated May 21, 1884), of Mrs. Eliza Austin, late of No. 67, Queen's-gardens, Bayswater, who died on Jan. 14 last, was proved on the 27th ult. by the Rev. Charles William Jones and Sir Henry Enfield Roscoe, the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £42,000. The testatrix leaves all her property, upon trust, for her daughter and only child, Mrs. Ann Jenkin.

The will (dated April 6, 1882) of Mr. George Trist, of No. 62, Old Broad-street, surveyor and auctioneer, and of Eliot Lodge, Sydenham-hill, who died on Dec. 25 last, at Prestwood, Sussex, was proved on the 5th inst. by Mrs. Ellen Trist, the widow, and John William Trist and George Arthur Trist, the sons, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £29,000. The testator, after making specific bequests of pictures, wines, and books to his wife and four children, bequeaths £200 each to the Sussex County Hospital and the Auctioneers' Benevolent Society; £50 each to the Charlwood Dispensary and the Sydenham Home for Sick Children; the cash at his banker's on his private account, his furniture, plate, effects, consumable stores, horses and carriages to his wife; his freehold house, 62, Old Broad-street, £5000 of the capital in his business, and the share of the profits therein coming to his estate, to his son John William, subject to his paying an annual sum to his wife; the remainder of his business capital to his wife; a farm and lands, upon trust, for each of his daughters, Mrs. Rose Ellen Langdale and Mrs. Katie Lawrance, and also £300 per annum each during the lifetime of his wife; certain railway and Government stocks and the Prestwood estate (excepting some parts, included in the devises, upon trust, for his daughters) to his son George Arthur; and numerous legacies to relatives, legal adviser, partner, clerks, governess, servants, and others. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, for his wife, for life or widowhood, but one moiety of the income is to be paid her in the event of her marrying again, and subject thereto for his said daughters.

The will (dated Feb. 16, 1884) of General Frederick Brooke Corfield, late of Knowle House, Church-road, Upper Norwood, who died on Sept. 2 last, was proved on the 18th ult. by Mrs. Julia Elizabeth Corfield, the widow, and James Mansell Moullin, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £14,000. The testator, after giving legacies to his nephews, niece, grandnephew, wife's sister, and executor, leaves the residue of his real and personal estate to his wife, absolutely; and he confirms the settlement already made on her.

Mr. Under-Sheriff Crawford has been elected City Solicitor, in succession to the late Sir Thomas J. Nelson.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, March 18.

The outlook improves, though the difficulty in regard to the Russian advance in Afghanistan is not near solved at the time of writing. The Exchanges of Europe, however, regard a settlement as more likely than war; and, consequently, all this week prices have been regaining lost ground. The return movement began on Saturday; but the currents which received direction from the alarm of war are not all arrested, or even checked. Gold has been flowing to London from most quarters, notwithstanding the advance in the rate of the Bank of Germany, and the premium placed on gold in France. It is probable that if this country were engaged in a great war, the return home of British capital would "break" more than one market. The unemployed balance at the Bank of England was, up to the last return, 17¼ millions; and it will go on increasing for two or three weeks yet. This is a good condition to have just now, and it is much to be desired that the present policy should continue until the matter of Afghanistan is permanently arranged. Apart from the general national interest, two classes are entitled to be heard under this head—namely, the mercantile community, because the Bank of England policy controls to a large extent the rate of discount; and the holders of Bank Stock, because the dividend is affected by such policy. The former have no grievance, because the rate is even now only 4 per cent; and the latter are not roused to interest themselves in what is now going on, because their dividend is the sufficiently high rate of 10 per cent per annum.

As Consols have been as low as 96⅛ during the recent crisis, and were 103 during the palmiest part of last year, it may be taken for granted that this is the range which we may expect to see traversed during periods not disturbed by a vast national war—such, for example, as is implied in a struggle with Russia, or some other great European Power. This experience appears to demonstrate that 3 per cent is not too much to pay in interest, and those who have stood out against the proposed conversion into a lower-interest stock are justified in claiming what is now taking place as in favour of their views. The lowest price of Consols during the Crimean War was 85, while just prior to that calamity the price was 102. Mr. Childers had, therefore, no new condition to warrant his attempt.

It is worth noting that within the past few days Metropolitan Board of Works 3 per cent stock has been on a level with Consols. At the instigation of Alderman Cotton, Mr. Childers is to present to the House of Commons a return of the conversions from 3 to 2¾ or 2½ per cent stock of any funds administered by Government.

The war fright has had the beneficial effect of shaking out a great number of weak speculators for the rise in almost all departments of Stock Exchange business. In British railways, Grand Trunk, and Mexican rails, the effect of this upon prices has been considerable. No failure of consequence has followed, but the losses only partly met must be very great.

The Bank of Africa is again to pay no dividend. The Manitoba Mortgage and Investment Company, Limited, pays 8 for 1884, as compared with 9, though the reduction is due not to the amount earned in 1884 being less than 1883, but to a much larger amount being carried to reserve. The Scottish Manitoba and North-West Real Estate Company, Limited, like all land-owning companies, did badly in 1884; but all expenses were met, and there is something in hand.

Furs should be cheap next season, if retail prices bear due relation to cost. Between two and three million North American skins are now being sold in Mincing-lane; and the Canadian Gazette records that, as compared with a year ago, mink is down 50 per cent; otter, 40; lynx, 35; fisher, fox, skunk, 30; and marten (commonly called sable), 20. Bears kept up; and white fox, of which the supply was small, went at much higher prices. Because of this fall, shares have dwindled from 25 to 18.

By the death of Sir Curtis Lampson, business circles lose a very prominent figure. Probably no one one was better known in connection with American and Canadian trade with this country. T. S.

The grant by Parliament of £20,000 to the family of the late General Gordon on the 12th inst., was a vote which will be universally approved.

The two University crews, having finished their first week's practice on the reach between Marlow and Cookham, have made their appearance on the Putney water this week.

The Earl of Devon distributed the prizes to the children in the Schools of the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick, in Stamford-street, Blackfriars, on Tuesday.

The Inventions Exhibition will be opened on Monday, May 4. It is expected that the Prince of Wales will undertake the ceremony.

Yesterday week, the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress were present at the opening of the extensive new buildings which have been added to St. Pancras Workhouse, at a cost of about £39,000. His Lordship gave it as his opinion that they were the most practical and best arranged for the purpose it had ever been his lot to witness, and declared them open for the reception of the aged and infirm female poor of St. Pancras.

The School Board for London discussed on the 12th inst., at much length, the old-standing question of the Shaftesbury training-ship. A recommendation of the Industrial Schools Committee to purchase a schooner yacht to take the place of the tender Swift, which has been condemned, was, after considerable opposition, agreed to. The amounts of money to be raised by the vestries and district boards on account of the education rate for the ensuing year were presented.

The first meeting of the committee of the fund for providing a national memorial to General Gordon was held last Saturday at the Mansion House, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Cambridge, the Lord Chancellor, Earl Granville, and Cardinal Manning were the principal speakers. It was decided that the memorial should take the form of a hospital at Port Said, and the Prince of Wales suggested that one of the wards should be named the "Stewart Ward," in memory of Gordon's distinguished lieutenant, Colonel Stewart. The fund already amounts to nearly £5000.

In an article in the Rangoon magazine Our Monthly, by Mr. Jardine, the late President of the British Burmah Board of Education, it is stated that the Bishop of Rangoon, Dr. Strachan, who is an M.D. of Edinburgh, has advocated the founding of a University at Rangoon, where the much-needed teaching of medicine may be obtained. At present, among a population verging on four millions, there is no medical school. The dispensaries are managed by Europeans or by natives of India, none of the Burmans having any skill in medicine or surgery. Mr. Jardine believes they have no books on the subject except translations of very ancient Hindoo books, and adds that the need of teaching the most elementary principles is very great and pressing. The Burmans confuse medicine with astrology and the science of charms. Quackery abounds everywhere, as there is no law requiring qualification nor any legal necessity to register as a practitioner. Any person, however unqualified, is allowed to practise.

IN THE SPRING.

The fresh birth of Nature gives a potent sense of life to young and old. It is the time of hope and aspiration, the time (to descend a step lower) of lamb and green peas, the time when young men are troubled with love fancies, and old men with bronchitis. The fickleness and indecision of spring are proverbial. It is like a beautiful girl whose head has been a little turned by flattery; like a clever idler, who is "everything by turns and nothing long"; like a statesman blown hither and thither by the wind of circumstance; like a colt half broken-in, that goes every way but the right one. We must own, to our regret, then, that an English spring, although very alluring, is not to be trusted. Its wayward fits are many, and at times it would seem to be in league with the doctor and undertaker.

> Come gentle spring! ethereal mildness! come, is a pretty invocation from a poet; but poetry, as we know on good authority, is not always a true thing; and no doubt when Thomson sent this bland invitation, he did not expect it to be accepted. Probably, he was sitting at the time with his feet upon the hob and a Scotch plaid round his shoulders.

When, as was the case a few years ago, snow lay thickly on the ground in April, weighing down the blossoms on the trees, one could not help sympathising with Thomas Hood's shivering stanzas upon Spring:—

> Let others eulogise her floral shows,
> From me they cannot win a single stanza;
> I know her blooms are in full blow, and so's
> The Influenza.
> Her cowslips, stocks, and lilies of the vale,
> Her honey-blossoms that you hear the bees at,
> Her pansies, daffodils, and primrose pale,
> Are things I sneeze at!

Poor Hood had indeed a hard time of it in spring, which, as he knew to his grief, is a time for consumption's seeds to appear, with other sowings; but the poets generally write of this season as the most delicious imaginable. From Chaucer to Tennyson our great singers have done honour to the priceless loveliness of Nature in March and April. Like true lovers, they shrink from seeing any defect in the object of their worship.

Proud-pied April, says Shakspeare, puts a spirit of youth in everything, and when the first buds open and the first flowers appear the poets are possessed by it. And their divine madness is felt also in a measure by the most prosaic natures—by the shopman behind his counter, by the merchant in his office, by the poor seamstress who hears the song of a caged thrush when she opens her window to admit the pale sunshine. Spring has come again, she says; and in fancy she sees the primroses on the banks and hears the joyous voice of the skylark, and the still sweeter voice of the mountain stream as it bounds over the rocks and tosses its spray upon the green banks. It must have been in spring-time that Wordsworth's "Poor Susan" heard, in the silence of morning, a bird singing at the corner of Wood-street:—

> "Tis a note of enchantment," what ails her? She sees
> A mountain ascending, a vision of trees;
> Bright volumes of vapour through Lothbury glide,
> And a river flows on through the vale of Cheapside.
> . . . . . .
> She looks, and her heart is in heaven; but they fade,
> The mist and the river, the hill and the shade;
> The stream will not flow, and the hill will not rise,
> And the colours have all passed away from her eyes.

Yes, the picture fades, and the vision is but a dream, and the hard, dull ways of life surround her and us in spite of the spring and the poets; but these glimpses of the beautiful, these April fancies, that send the blood pulsating through the veins—these phantom-like indications of a loveliness we are unable to grasp—surely serve to make the road of life less barren.

We admit, too, that they have another effect. The restlessness manifested by birds and animals in the spring is felt also by our race. The dull content of winter gives place to an inclination for movement and enterprise. In the dead hours of snow and slush, of darkness and fog, we think only of endurance: with the earliest sunshine of March we cry out for enjoyment. We cannot sit still, or, if we do, it is against the grain. Few people living in a great city like London and confined to it are easy-tempered in spring. They are conscious of something going on in which they ought to be participating. In the woods a burst of music from a thousand throats fills the crisp morning air; in the fields and on the hedgerow banks the young green is hiding the decay of winter, and flowers cover the brown leaves. Rooks are building their nests, ring-doves coo, flocks of starlings sweep about before making their matrimonial engagements for the season; in short, all Nature is alive, and the dullest of us feel the general vitality. Yet so great are the claims of society and the power of fashion, that many of us, although conscious of a spring-time in our blood, let the season of birds and flowers go by without making the most of it. Nature has never so much to reveal as in March and April and in the early days of May, but custom seems to have decided that we must not then listen to her teaching. It is a pity. A visitor so beautiful, and that comes but once a year, is too precious a guest to be treated with indifference. We need not accept in its bare literalness the poet's statement that

> One impulse from the vernal woods
> Will teach us more of man,
> Of moral evil, and of good,
> Than all the sages can.

But we can believe and assert that the characters most finely touched are those that have felt most deeply the healing, invigorating power of Nature; and that to meet her in the spring, when her young life is full of mystery and joy, is to win for ourselves a loving and gracious companion all the year round.

THE COURT.

The Empress Eugénie visited the Queen on Thursday week, and remained to luncheon. Yesterday week her Majesty decorated Sergeant-Major Peter Smith, 1st Battalion Scots Guards, and Private Frank Hayes, of the 10th Hussars, with the medal for distinguished service in the field, in recognition of their gallant conduct during the Egyptian campaign of 1882 and the campaign in the Soudan of 1884. The Queen and Royal family and the members of her Majesty's household attended Divine service in the private chapel on Sunday morning. The Very Rev. the Dean of Westminster and the Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor officiated. The Dean of Westminster preached the sermon. The Duchess of Albany left Windsor Castle on Monday morning for Claremont. The Queen and Princess Beatrice, attended by the suite, left Windsor Castle last Tuesday on a visit to the metropolis. The Royal party proceeded to Buckingham Palace. Her Majesty held a Drawingroom on Wednesday; and, owing to the fact of its being the first held by her Majesty in person for a considerable period, it was attended by an unusually large number of ladies. Among the débutantes was Princess Louise of Wales, and in the streets loud cheers greeted the appearance of the Princess of Wales and her daughter.

The Prince of Wales was present at a meeting yesterday week of the Royal Commission on the Dwelling-Places of the Working Classes. His Royal Highness went to the House of Lords in the afternoon. Prince Waldemar left Marlborough House on his return to Denmark, the Prince and Princess accompanying his Royal Highness to the Victoria Station, where they took leave of him. The Prince was present last Saturday morning at a meeting at the Mansion House of the Lord Mayor's Committee for the purpose of collecting funds to erect a national memorial to General Gordon, and moved the first resolution. In the afternoon, by command of the Queen, a Levée was held at St. James's Palace by his Royal Highness on behalf of her Majesty. The Prince and Princess and Prince George of Wales honoured the Duke and Duchess of St. Albans by their company at dinner. On Sunday the Prince and Princess, Prince George, and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, were present at Divine service. Presiding on Monday night at a meeting of the Royal Colonial Institute, when a paper on Western Australia was read by its Governor, Sir F. Napier Broome, the Prince of Wales remarked that he took a lively interest in our Australasian colonies, and he expressed the gratitude which the country entertained for their offers of assistance. The Royal chairman was accompanied by Prince Albert Victor. On Tuesday afternoon his Royal Highness, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor, went to the House of Lords. The Prince of Wales had a long conversation with Lord Granville. His Royal Highness afterwards went into the House, and bade good-bye to the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Salisbury, and other Peers. In the evening, at Willis's Rooms, Prince Albert Victor was initiated into Freemasonry. The Prince of Wales, as Master of the Royal Alpha Lodge, performed the ceremony. The Prince of Wales has left London for Berlin, accompanied by the Duke of Edinburgh and Prince Albert Victor, for the purpose of personally congratulating the Emperor of Germany on the attainment of his eighty-eighth birthday.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh were present at the first performance of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's new opera at the Savoy Theatre last Saturday evening. On Tuesday the Duchess (for the second time), Princess Beatrice, and Prince Louis of Battenberg witnessed the performance.

Stormy Waters, by Robert Buchanan, in three volumes (J. and R. Maxwell), is distinctly a novel of adventure. Differing in style and ability from previous works of Mr. Buchanan's, in which such a high standard has been reached, the present book will no doubt suffer greatly from the favourable recollection which all readers could not fail to retain of those able efforts, and "Stormy Waters" may proportionately disappoint many. The characters are stilted and unnatural, with the exception of Bob Downsey, the cabman, who is of a humorous turn of mind, and his excellent wife, "Matildar." The opening of the story is decidedly good; the village policeman's mistaken idea as to Bob's fare, his pursuit in consequence, the bewilderment of the rustics, and the resurrection of the sailor, are well blended, and produce a happy and amusing episode. The meeting of the dynamite plotters is well described, and the analysis of the characters of the several members composing the brotherhood is clever. The scenes succeeding the start of Harry Hastings and Esther for the "other side," on board an old and unseaworthy ship, are exciting; and, besides, the book has plots and incidents enough to satisfy the most sensational of readers: amongst these are an agitation meeting, a murder, a dynamite explosion, and a shipwreck.

WITH THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION: THE BRITISH EXPEDITION FORDING THE MURGHAB AT MARUCHAK.
SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. W. SIMPSON.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Our last week's publication contained more than a dozen Sketches by our Special Artist, Mr. William Simpson, accompanying the Staff of Major-General Sir Peter Lumsden, K.C.B., the British Commissioner for the survey and delimitation of the north-west boundary of Afghanistan. Two pages of his Sketches, with a Map of the disputed territory north of Herat, were given in the preceding Number of this Journal. Mr. Simpson has furnished views of many places on the Heri-Rud, the Kushk, and the Murghab rivers, which were never before depicted, or even minutely described by any European traveller, but which had only been cursorily mentioned by Vambéry and other writers. These places are likely to be of some political and even military importance. The Map of the Heri-Rud Valley, from Pul-i-Khatun to the Zulfagar Pass, drawn by Captain Arthur F. Barrow, Aide-de-Camp to Sir Peter Lumsden, which we engraved and published last week, was accompanied by Captain Barrow's notes on the capabilities of military advance by that route, and on the importance of holding it against an enemy approaching towards Herat. Mr. Simpson was with Sir Peter Lumsden's party in the journey from Sarakhs, starting on Nov. 11, up the Heri-Rud to Pul-i-Khatun and to Goolar, opposite the Zulfagar Pass, on their way to Kuhsan, where they met Colonel Ridgeway and the other members of the Commission from India. The following passage of Mr. Simpson's letter describing the route shown in Captain Barrow's map seems to confirm that officer's account of it, and may be of some future service:—

"The march from Pul-i-Khatun to Kojeh Saham-ed-din, and thence to Goolar, on our way to Kuhsan, was a very interesting one. The interest of it lies in its strategic features in relation to a force moving from Sarakhs on the line of the Heri-Rud towards Herat. From Sarakhs to Pul-i-Khatun the ground is open; on the left or Persian side it may be called a plain the whole way; but on the right bank a gentle rise begins at Kizil Koi, about eight miles south of Sarakhs. This rise assumes the character of a plateau or of undulating downs, all the way south to Pul-i-Khatun. Nowhere in that space is there any strong position of defence. At Pul-i-Khatun the whole character of the ground changes, the bed of the river becomes rocky, and perhaps about a quarter of a mile distant a gorge presents itself. Here the strata stand nearly perpendicular, and the road leaves the river to pass over the spurs of the higher hills on the south. This gorge, with one or two small heights, and the spurs just mentioned, could be easily made very formidable, if not impregnable; even as they are, a very small force could stop a very large one. Such is the position at Pul-i-Khatun itself; and it forms the key of the whole strategic problem. It is the Elburz Range which sends eastward, or south-eastward, to be more correct, at this point one of its ridges; the ridge dips down to the Heri-Rud, disappears, and crops up again on the east side of the bridge, from which it slowly rises towards the Zulfagar Pass. It is a common feature of the hills in this region to be steep and rocky, almost precipitous, on the south and south-west; while on the north the slope is easy. The ridge extending south-east from Pul-i-Khatun is of this character. For a few miles it is no great height, and there are one or two places where it might be passed by troops. The best place would be what is known as the Germab Pass, about nine miles from Pul-i-Khatun; this line takes the "chord" of the curve which the river makes westward to Pul-i-Khatun. When the river is low, this pass is taken by travellers from its being the shortest line to Sarakhs. A force coming south could turn the position at Pul-i-Khatun by this pass, but if the defending force was large enough to extend along the whole ground to the Germab Pass, it would have a strong position. The Germab Pass, it will be understood, must form part of the whole position to be included as belonging to Pul-i-Khatun. South-east of the Germab Pass, the ridge becomes so elevated and steep in parts that no force would try to surmount them. The next pass is that known as the Zulfagar; its southern entrance must be about thirty miles from Pul-i-Khatun, and the distance from leaving the river to the point where it is again touched by anyone coming through must be still greater; and I understand that no water is found in the pass itself. This will indicate one difficulty in marching troops by this line, on account of the want of water; and if there were a force defending the south end of the pass, the difficulty might be increased. The Zulfagar Pass is a very striking one, from the parallel ridges of level strata in the hills on each side, which rise to a great height.

"Kojeh Saham-ed-din is a saint's tomb, but our camp was at a spring of water about a mile from it. Our next march, to Goolar, was a very short one, being only eight miles. The deserted character of this part, since leaving Pul-i-Khatun, is even greater than anything we have yet passed. The ground has been cultivated at some former date; and we have seen spots on which towns have stood; now there is not an inhabited house all the way to Kuhsan. At Goolar we were in a piece of open country, with plains and heights, but of a small elevation, in comparison with the hills around.

"Our march from Goolar was at first for about seven or eight miles south, still on the west side of the Heri-Rud, which we had not seen since the march from Pul-i-Khatun—on that march we crossed it, and recrossed it again. Right across our line on leaving Goolar was the Kuh-i-Jam range; and our line south, over the lower ground, brought us to this range, which we began to ascend in a valley. On our left were four marked hills known as the Chakar Dowli—"Chakar" meaning four. Between two of these the Heri-Rud passes out from the Kuh-i-Jam into the open country between that and the high ranges at Zulfagar. The gorges of the river where it passes the Kuh-i-Jam are impassable for travellers; hence the necessity for going over the hills. Our route lay up the valley in a south-westerly direction. Troops could march by this road, but nothing on wheels could pass. We stopped for the night at an open bit of ground, where there was a stream of good water, with trees. On the top of a hill are some bits of the walls of a fort, called Stoi, but the Persians call it Istoi, and this gives the name to the Pass. We were said to be about 4000 feet above the sea at this place, and it was very cold. There were clouds and a few drops of rain or sleet."

The party had four days' marches yet to perform, by Tut-i-Durukht and Toman Agha, before arriving, on Nov. 19, at Kuhsan, which they left on the 24th, as related in Mr. Simpson's letter published last week, for the winter quarters of the Commission at Bala Murghab.

Part of the expedition went to the upper valley of the Murghab by a different route, more directly eastward, through the Jamsheedie settlements and Kila Nau, which is described in an interesting letter in the Times of Thursday, the 12th inst. Sir Peter Lumsden, and our Special Artist in his suite, moved into the Kushk valley, and descended northward, or rather north-east, to the junction of that river with the Murghab at Ak Tapa, thence going up the Murghab, by Penjdeh and Maruchak, as described in the letter we printed last week. The fording of the Murghab at Maruchak, on Dec. 8, which has also been described, is the subject of one of our present Illustrations.

THE CHURCH.

The Bishop of Norwich has intimated his intention of resigning his see in the course of next year.

The Archbishop of Canterbury held a Confirmation at Croydon parish church last Saturday afternoon. There were nearly 400 candidates.

The Crown living of St. Thomas's, Coventry, worth about £200 per annum, has been offered by Mr. Gladstone to the Rev. E. H. Flynn, Curate of the parish church of Teddington, who has accepted it.

The Rev. W. Thornton Webber, Vicar of St. John the Evangelist, Holborn, has been nominated by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Bishopric of Brisbane, in succession to Dr. Dale, who has recently resigned that see.

In accordance with the suggestion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, special services were held yesterday week in St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and many other churches throughout the country, in memory of the late General Gordon. The Princess of Wales and Prince Waldemar were present at the service at St. Paul's.

The Bishop-Designate of Lincoln (Dr. King) has contributed £200 to the fund which has been recently started to complete the endowment of the Bishopric of Southwell. The Rev. Canon Ingram, 20, Finsbury-square, is acting as hon. secretary. Already about £7760 is promised, and about £6300 remains to be collected.

A meeting of the Central Council of Diocesan Conferences was held on Tuesday in the rooms of the National Society, Westminster—Mr. C. Raikes, M.P., in the chair. It was resolved to recommend for discussion at diocesan conferences, "The duty of Churchmen at the present time, independently of politics, in view of the present efforts to make disestablishment and disendowment of the Church a political question."

The Bishop of Sodor and Man preached on Sunday in aid of the funds of the Brompton Hospital—in the morning at St. Peter's, Cranley-gardens, South Kensington, where £70 was collected; and in the evening at Brunswick Chapel, Upper Berkeley-street, where the collection amounted to about £33. Over 300 inmates are daily cared for in this hospital, and yet there are 213 applicants awaiting vacancies.

A painted memorial window, from the studio of Mr. Charles Evans, of Warwick-street, Regent-street, has been placed in the old parish church of Gillingham, to the memory of the late Mr. Rumney, of Stubbins House, Lancashire, father-in-law of the Vicar.—A very effective Munich window, from Messrs. Mayer and Co.'s studio, has been placed in the parish church of Huish Episcopi, Somerset, by Mrs. Michell, in memory of her husband, the late Major-General Michell, C.B., of the Royal Artillery.

The Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty held their annual meeting on Wednesday for the distribution of their surplus revenue to Dec. 31 last, in grants to meet benefactions offered by others on behalf of benefices the net incomes of which do not exceed £200 per annum. For want of sufficient funds, the Governors were again unable to comply with all the applications made to them. The benefices selected for augmentation, from a list of ninety-two, were seventy-five in number, situated in almost every diocese in England and Wales. The grants given amounted in the aggregate to £19,200, while the benefactions from others accepted to obtain such grants were of the value of £23,313.

THE DISASTER AT SHOEBURYNESS.

The terrible accident on the 26th ult., at the Military School of Gunnery, Shoeburyness, caused the death of eight persons—namely, Colonel Walter Aston Fox-Strangways, R.A., Commandant and Superintendent there; Colonel Francis Lyon, R.A., Superintendent of the Royal Laboratory at Woolwich Arsenal; Captain Francis Michael Goold-Adams, R.A., Assistant-Superintendent of Experiments at the School of Gunnery; and Sergeant-Major Adams, leader of the experimental team of gunners upon that occasion; also, two other gunners, named Allen and Underwood, Warrant-officer Dakin, and an artificer, James Rance; several others were severely wounded. This was a loss of life about equal to that suffered by the British Army in one of its great battles in the Soudan. It was owing to the premature explosion of a shell, six inches wide and eighteen inches long, with a charge of six pounds and a half of gunpowder, to which a newly invented "sensitive base percussion fuse" had just been screwed in order to try an experiment by firing it from a gun. This fuse was one of Colonel Lyon's invention, and he had come from Woolwich to see it tried.

Colonel Fox-Strangways was fifty-two years of age, son of a clergyman near Exeter, and nephew to General Strangways, who was killed at the battle of Inkerman, by the bursting of a shell, thirty years ago. He was also nephew or cousin, on the mother's side, to General Sir Redvers Buller. He served with credit in the Crimean War. Colonel Lyon, whose Portrait we give, was born in 1834; he served in the Indian Mutiny War of 1857 and 1858, and was at the siege of Lucknow. He had of late years been much employed on Staff duty, and on committees to test the powers of breech-loading guns and the resistance of targets. He was about to quit his office at the Woolwich Laboratory, where he had been since 1871, and was to command the Royal Artillery in the Western District of England. He was married to a sister of Lord Valentia. Captain Goold-Adams was thirty years of age, and served in the last Afghan War; he was an artillery officer of great talent and skill, and had invented some valuable improvements.

The Portrait of Colonel Lyon is from a photograph by Mr. Cobb, of Woolwich, taken some years ago.

The number of live stock, and the quantity of fresh meat landed at Liverpool during the past week from American and Canadian ports amounted to 19 2 cattle, 9236 quarters of fresh beef, and 1433 carcases of mutton.

"Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, and Knightage," for this year—the 172nd of publication—has been carefully revised to the date of publication by its painstaking editor, Robert Henry Mair, LL.D. As stated in the preface, the contents may be said to bear the stamp of warranty, as during last year upwards of 20,000 correspondents furnished him with information relative to births, deaths, marriages, promotions, and alterations of addresses that had occurred in their families; while more than 17,000 corrected or approved the proofs that were submitted for their inspection. In addition to the ordinary information, pains have been taken in the present issue to obtain information relative to residents abroad and collateral branches of families, together with genealogical information. The work is illustrated with 1400 armorial bearings. Its publishers are Messrs. Dean and Son, Fleet-street.—This firm has issued another excellent book of reference, "Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench," for the present year, under the supervision of the same trustworthy editor, Mr. Mair. It is full of valuable information and has 800 armorial bearings.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

"It has been agreed between Russia and England that no further advance should be made on either side." These reassuring words of Mr. Gladstone, in oblique reply to a question by Mr. Richard suggesting that Russia and England should have recourse to the good offices of a friendly Power, were cheered by the House of Commons on the 13th inst. Both the tone and the subject-matter of the Prime Minister's answer seemed to imply the existence of a better understanding between the English and Russian Governments with regard to the critical question of the delay in the delimitation of the frontier of Afghanistan on its Turkestan borders.

Although the excitement, which under the surface ruled as great within as outside Parliament, subsided to some extent when the reassuring statement of the Premier was made, the subsequent interrogations and replies betokened the sustained interest of the Opposition and Ministry both in this Anglo-Russian difficulty. As the Marquis of Salisbury, with accustomed clearness and directness put it in the House of Lords on Tuesday, it is on the face of it desirable that Russia should know that her occupation of the ground in dispute can only be regarded as temporary. For how long is the existing arrangement to remain valid? Perhaps the most satisfactory way for the Czar to determine that point would be to immediately order the dilatory Russian Commissioner to quicken his steps in the direction of the frontier, there to define the line of delimitation in conjunction with Major-General Sir Peter Lumsden. The terms of the Ministerial explanations being identical in the Lords and Commons, it is only necessary to quote the telegram which Earl Granville read to Lord Salisbury as having come from Sir E. Thornton, Her Majesty's Minister to Russia:—

St. Petersburg, March 16, 1885.—The Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs states that the Russian troops will not advance from the posts now occupied by them, provided that the Afghan forces do not advance or attack, or unless in the case of some extraordinary reason, such, for instance, as a disturbance in Penjdeh. He also states that the strictest orders have been sent to the Russian commanders to avoid, by every possible means, a conflict or any incitement to a conflict, and that these orders will be repeated.

Egypt has not of late, it must be admitted, inspired any interchange of marked courtesy between the occupants of the Treasury and Opposition benches in either House. Hence, as an agreeable surprise came Mr. Gladstone's spontaneous acknowledgment in the Lower House on Tuesday that Sir Stafford Northcote and his colleagues had been particularly considerate in not pressing the Government with questions concerning the negotiations as to the Egyptian Financial Convention. Mr. Gladstone had the satisfaction of being able to assure the leader of the Opposition that all the Ambassadors had on that day signed the preliminary declaration, and that on Wednesday the Financial Convention itself would receive the formal sanction of the representatives of the Powers. It remains to be seen whether Parliament will approve the Convention. Its terms were summarised by Mr. Childers on Wednesday. A loan of nine millions is to be raised, with the understanding that the expenditure of Egypt should be fixed at £5,237,000 per annum, with £200,000 for the Army of Occupation, £315,000 to be devoted annually to repay the loan; a reduction of 5 per cent. to take place on all coupons on the Bonds, and half per cent. on the interest of the Suez Canal shares; and there being an International guarantee for the loan.

The condition of our Navy, as Mr. Linley Sambourne facetiously reminds one in Punch this week, was as burning a question in the time of chatty Samuel Pepys as it is now. Possibly, this amusing drawing will help to console the Government in the midst of the sweeping broadsides being poured into them by the enthusiastic advocates of a stronger torpedo flotilla—enthusiasts who plainly are not inclined to sing with gusto just now the old familiar refrain of "We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money, too!" Mr. W. H. Smith, indeed, on Monday, lugubriously indulged in a melancholy ditty of the "Tom Bowling" order, the burden being that the Navy was under-shipped, so to speak, and under-manned. Prior to this Armstrong gun discharge point-blank by the ex-First Lord of the Admiralty, Sir Thomas Brassey was called upon to box the compass and otherwise display his qualifications as a seaman for the benefit of Dr. Cameron, Mr. Puleston, Mr. Marriott, Sir John Hay, and Sir H. Drummond-Wolff. Once in Committee on the Naval Estimates, Sir Thomas Brassey lost no time in praising, amid sympathetic cheers, the gallantry shown by the Naval Brigades at Souakim and on the Nile. Coming to figures, he placed the Naval Estimates for the ensuing year at £13,090,440, as against £11,645,711 last year; the increased expenditure being accounted for by an addition of a hundred officers and six hundred boys to the Squadrons in the Red Sea and on the Chinese Station; an addition of five hundred officers and men and five hundred Marines for Egypt; and by contracting for four Ironclads, five Cruisers, seven Scouts, five Gun-boats, fifteen Torpedo-boats, and a formidable Torpedo-ram. In the teeth of this portentous Naval Budget, Mr. W. H. Smith, as aforesaid, let fly a volley of adverse criticism from the other side of the table; and was followed on the same tack by the noble Lord who seems desirous of running Mr. Smith close for the reversion of the First Lordship of the Admiralty when the Conservatives resume office. Lord Henry Lennox, however, was not the man to stand between the wind and the votes for men and wages required by Sir Thomas Brassey.

The great bill of the Session drags its slow length along. Sir Charles Dilke has exhibited tact in the conduct of the Redistribution Bill through the House; but his task has been inevitably lightened by the aid he has received from Sir Stafford Northcote, who is not only true to his understanding with the Government as regards the measure in the House, but who on Monday took part with the Marquis of Salisbury in a meeting of the Conservative Party, apparently called at the Carlton Club on purpose to enforce upon the Conservative rank and file the necessity of supporting the broad lines of the bill. On the 13th inst., the representatives of the City, led gallantly by Mr. Alderman Fowler, made a gallant fight for the retention of the City's four seats, which the bill will reduce to two; but they were worsted, the amendment being negatived by 162 against 117 votes. The Irish Home Rule members having made a night of it on Monday, and being generally absent next day celebrating St. Patrick's Night in congenial fashion, further progress was reported on Tuesday. The remaining clauses were passed, and the first schedule was reached.

Mr. Gladstone is to be credited with a just and politic reference to the subject of German colonisation. The Premier's friendly speech towards Germany, on the 12th inst., and the expression of his earnest hope that she would become associated with England in spreading civilisation (not by the aid of gunpowder and bayonets solely, it is to be hoped) in the benighted regions of the earth, extorted a cordial acknowledgment from Prince Bismarck. Then followed the visit of the Prince of Wales with Prince Albert Victor and the Duke of Edinburgh to Berlin to wish the venerable Emperor "many happy returns of the day." And thus Germany and England should be better friends than ever.

PUBLIC DEBT OF NEW ZEALAND. CONVERSION of £3,772,000 NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT FIVE PER CENT CONSOLS.—The Governor and Company of the Bank of England Give Notice that, on behalf of the agents appointed by the Governor of New Zealand in Council, under the New Zealand Consolidated Stocks Act, 1877, the Amendment Act, 1881, and the Consolidated Stock Act, 1884, Sir Francis Dillon Bell, K.C.M.G., and Sir Penrose Goodchild Julyan, K.C.M.G., C.B.), they are authorised to invite holders of the debentures of the above loan to bring in their debentures for conversion, on the following terms, viz.:

For every one hundred pounds of such debentures a new debenture will be issued for the same amount, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum for seven years, from April 15, 1885, to April 15, 1892, when it will be converted into £100 New Zealand Four per Cent Consolidated Stock, inscribed at the Bank of England, which will rank pari passu with the Four per Cent Consolidated Stock already created and issued, and redeemable at par on Nov. 1, 1929.

Applications for conversion will be received up to April 30 next, inclusive.

The interest upon the new debentures will be payable by coupons in the same manner as upon the Consol Debentures—viz., Jan. 15, April 15, July 15, and Oct. 15, at the Bank of England, the first coupon being for the dividend due July 15 next.

Consol Debentures, from which the coupon due April 15 next must be detached, may be deposited at the Chief Cashier's Office, Bank of England, for exchange on or after Wednesday, the 11th inst. They must bear all coupons subsequent to that due April 15 next, and must be left three clear days for examination. Receipts will be given for the debentures deposited, and the new debentures will be issued in exchange as soon after as possible.

The usual annual drawing for redemption of the Consols will take place on Tuesday, March 31 next; debentures deposited before that date will not be affected by the drawing. Holders of Consol Debentures drawn for redemption, in respect of which no application for conversion has been made, will be allowed to receive, in exchange for each drawn debenture, a new debenture as above, upon payment of the sum of £4 per cent, provided application be made before April 15 next.

By the Act 9 and 10 Vict., ch. 59, the revenues of the colony of New Zealand alone will be liable in respect of the stock and the dividends thereon; and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, will not be directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the stock or of the dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto.

JAY'S, REGENT-STREET.

CRÊPE IMPÉRIAL, for Mourning Wear. It is all wool, and yet looks exactly like crape, as it has the crinkled or crimped surface which is inseparable from that fabric. It is solid and most durable, being free from the elasticity of the more perishable silk crêpe, which it so closely resembles, and yet it is glossy. It is made up effectively into costumes for deep mourning, when it is not compulsory to trim with crape, and will wear as long as the mourner elects to use it.—Extract from "The Queen, the Lady's Newspaper."

CHAPTER XVIII.

SUSAN'S REVENGE.

While Miss Susan Bowman was hatching schemes of vengeance and brushing her mistress's hair with unnecessary violence; while the select portion of the public which calls itself society was criticising the first number of the Anglo-Saxon; and while one of the contributors to that journal was complacently telling himself twenty times a day that the world was a pleasant place to live in, Mrs. Adrian Vidal was chiefly occupied in stitching at certain diminutive garments, which were hastily thrust under the sofa-cushions when a visitor was announced.

We are often told that approaching maternity brings with it a peculiarly ennobling and purifying influence—that a woman is never nearer Heaven than when this prospect opens before her, and a good deal more to the like effect. All this may be—and we will hope that it is—perfectly true. We may concede that a woman who doesn't like babies is an unnatural and rather shocking sort of woman; and yet we may be allowed to doubt whether many women, when they marry, bestow much thought upon the ordinary consequence of marriage. Clare, at any rate, had not done so. This sitting at home, while her husband went out into the world, this anxious conning of household bills, this solitary and often apprehensive waiting for the unknown—well, perhaps it was the natural and fitting life for her to lead; but it was not the life she had dreamt of on sunny summer days at Polruth. There were times when she was desperately lonely, and not a little homesick. It is not permitted to anyone, however young, or however much in love, to break all at once and altogether with the past; and there were many things that Clare missed, without knowing how much she missed them. She wanted her kind old fussy mother; she wanted the boys; she wanted space and liberty, and the fresh, healthy ring of young voices and laughter about her. And so it came to pass that from time to time a tear would splash down upon her sewing, and she had to take herself severely to task for a discontent which she acknowledged to be unjustifiable. The failure of previous dreams to fulfil themselves did not prevent her from continuing to dream as she sewed; and lest she should fall too low in the estimation of mothers, it may be added that in these fanciful pictures of the future the coming tyrant played a very important part. Hope springs eternal in the human breast; when one thing fails, another must needs take its place, or we could not go on living at all. It may be that Clare had some unacknowledged consciousness that "baby fingers, waxen touches," must be accepted as a substitute for certain ideals which can never be realised in this world.

And, after all, she was not lonely, as most people count loneliness. In these days, Adrian frequently asked a friend or two to dine with him quietly; and it was with affectionate warmth that he congratulated his wife upon the excellent little dinners which she contrived to set before them. It pleased Clare that he should be pleased; and it also pleased her to make the acquaintance of the colleagues whom he invited to his house, and who were entertaining enough in their way. Some of them had wives, who called upon her, and every now and then a lady of fashion who had taken up Mr. Vidal would remember that Mr. Vidal was a married man, and would good-naturedly push a voyage of discovery as far as Alexandra-gardens.

Amongst these was one with whose condescension Clare could very well have dispensed: but she was determined to conquer a distrustfulness which had caused her to act foolishly upon a previous occasion, and when Lady St. Austell, all smiles and geniality, was ushered into her little drawing-room, she did her best to respond to the kindness of her visitor's greeting. Lady St. Austell, who, for her part, thought Clare singularly uninteresting, disguised her sentiments as effectively and with as little exertion as usual.

"I have found you out, you see—or rather, I have found you in, which is so much nicer. What a pretty house you have got! I met your husband the other night, and he told me your address. Why were you not with him? You are not going out just now?——oh—h!" Her Ladyship took in the situation, and looked sympathetic and just a shade contemptuous. She had never herself been debarred from the pleasures of society by any such cause, and she felt a sincere pity for less fortunate people. "I was hoping that you would dine with us quite quietly some evening," she went on; "but, of course, if you think you had better not——Perhaps you will spare us Mr. Vidal, though; we should be so glad to see him."

Clare murmured that she was sure her husband would be most happy, and secretly hoped that her husband might be prevented by a previous engagement from accepting the threatened invitation.

The invitation, however, when it came, proved to be for an evening on which Adrian was not engaged, and he drove off to Grosvenor-square with anticipations of amusement which were amply fulfilled. Only seven people besides himself sat down round the oval table, and probably nobody's enjoyment was interfered with by the circumstance that the master of the house, who had gone to Newmarket, was not one of them. Lady St. Austell's guests were all young, and, judging by their conversation, were of a cheerful temperament. She herself was in high spirits, being—as she took an early opportunity of announcing—overjoyed to be back in London and among her friends once more.

"After all, there is no place like it," she said. "One grumbles at London sometimes, and one is glad enough to get away when the end of July comes; but one never really enjoys life, except by fits and starts, anywhere else. Mr. Vidal agrees with me; don't you, Mr. Vidal? When I saw him last, he was talking of settling down in the deepest depths of the country; but he has changed his mind, as I told him he would, and now I hope he won't think of going into exile again."

"London couldn't get on without Mr. Vidal," remarked one of Adrian's neighbours, politely. "What would become of the Anglo-Saxon if it lost its best man?"

They had all seen the Anglo-Saxon, and had a great many questions to ask about it, although they evidently were not people whose tastes inclined them towards much reading. If their amiable intention was to give pleasure to the young writer, they were doubtless rewarded by perceiving their success. Lady St. Austell herself addressed the greater part of her remarks to him, treating him with easy familiarity, like an old friend. When dinner was over, she took him away into a corner, and said: "Now tell me what you have been doing since that day when I went out fishing with you and lost my line. Oh, but I know, though; you have been getting married, and honeymooning, and all that. How glad you must be that it is over!"

"I don't know that I am," answered Adrian. "Were you glad when your honeymoon was over?"

"Glad was not the word! I jumped for joy; and so did Lord St. Austell. At least, he would have jumped if he hadn't had the gout so badly. I don't mean to say that it might not have been different if one had been in other company, though," she added, pensively.

"In Johnny Spencer's, for instance?" suggested Adrian, who had found out that he could say what he liked to this lady.

She looked up interrogatively. "Johnny Spencer? Did I tell you anything about him?"

"Yes; down at Polruth—don't you remember? You told me a great deal about him. Everything, in fact."

"Oh, did I? Well, I am sorry to say that poor Johnny has become very stupid and dull. He turned up at Melton in the winter with his hideous wife, and I was quite shocked at the change in him. Marriage is the ruin of one's friends: they might as well die at once, for any comfort that one gets out of their company afterwards."

"And have you filled up his place?" asked Adrian, risking a second impertinence.

Lady St. Austell sighed. "Not yet," she answered, quite seriously. "I still consider myself as being in a sort of way in mourning for him; though perhaps he doesn't deserve it." She added, after a moment, "Were you thinking of applying for the vacancy?"

Adrian was really not quite sure whether she was laughing at him or not; but he said, "Oh, I am one of those who are as good as dead, you know. Besides, I doubt whether I should give satisfaction."

"I am almost afraid you wouldn't," Lady St. Austell agreed. "In one sense, you know too much, and in another, perhaps, you don't know quite enough. However, there is no reason in the world why we should not be friends."

"None—if you honour me so far as to wish for my friendship."

"Oh, the honour is all the other way. I have often wished so much to be upon terms of intimacy with an author; but somehow, authors are generally rather impossible sort of people, and I have never got beyond distant civilities with any one of them. You are different. You belong to one's own class; or, at any rate, you behave as if you did."

"Thank you very much," said Adrian, who began to see that Lady St. Austell was quite as capable of uttering impertinences as of listening to them.

She laughed. "Well; you understand what I mean. A man who knows nobody and goes nowhere may be a brilliant genius; but it isn't very easy to talk to him. Now, with you, I shall always be able to fall back upon gossip when I am tired of discussing novels. And that reminds me to say how much I enjoyed your last book. Your heroine was charming. Of course she was Mrs. Vidal?"

"So people tell me," remarked Adrian. "I wasn't aware of it until I was told."

"See what it is to be in love! But you must try to fall in love with somebody else before you write another book, or you won't be able to give us the variety that we need. And variety is the thing to struggle after, both in novels and in real life. Don't you think so?"

When he reached home, Adrian did not give a verbatim report of this and other speeches which Lady St. Austell made to him in the course of the evening. He thought that they might be open to misconstruction; and Clare, who usually put him through a friendly cross-examination on his return at night, had not many questions to ask this time.

To Clare it was a matter of surprise as well as regret that her husband should like a woman whom she found so objectionable; and that he did like Lady St. Austell was plainly to be seen from the reserve with which he spoke of her. She attributed this phenomenon in part to the workings of the artistic nature which, she presumed, must necessarily be attracted by a good subject, whether that subject be in itself a pleasing one or the reverse.

Not long after this, a visitor remarked to her, casually, "I saw Mr. Vidal in the Park yesterday afternoon. He was driving in a victoria with a lady who, I was told, was Lady St. Austell, the wife of that dreadfully wicked old man. Is she a friend of yours?"

"Not exactly a friend," Clare answered. "We know her because my parents live near Lord St. Austell's place in Cornwall."

She managed to preserve an appearance of composure, and to give such information as she could to her visitor, who was very anxious to know whether Lord St. Austell was really as scandalous a person and as cruel a husband as he was said to be; but inwardly she felt as if an icy hand had been laid upon her heart. Was Adrian beginning to have concealments from her, then? Why had he not told her that he had been driving with Lady St. Austell?

When he came in she put the question to him tranquilly, but so abruptly that he coloured and looked guilty. If he had replied, "Because you were so silly as to be jealous of her once," no harm would have been done; but he judged it more prudent to say, carelessly, "Oh, I don't know; I didn't think it would interest you." Whereupon Clare left the room without making any rejoinder.

For the rest of the day she looked pale and miserable, and scarcely spoke; while Adrian, who naturally felt himself aggrieved, did not choose to pave the way for a reconciliation. To sulk was not, however, in his nature. Late that evening, while he was sitting in his study, trying to work and finding work impossible, he said to himself that, at any rate, the beginning of an estrangement should not come from him. Clare was utterly unreasonable; but, when all was said, her unreasonableness arose from love. To understand is to forgive, and he understood his wife better than she understood him. He threw down his pen, stole up stairs to her bed-room, where he found her disconsolately adding up accounts, and said he had come to make friends.

"You little goose! why do you create troubles for yourself out of nothing at all? I went to leave a card in Grosvenor-square, and at the door I met Lady St. Austell, who said she was just starting for the Park and would give me a lift as far as Kensington Gardens if I was on my way home. So I said, 'All right,' and off we went. That was the beginning and end of the whole business. Now, don't you think you are rather a goose?"

He fully expected that Clare would make the desired admission, and that the customary redintegratio amoris would ensue. He was, therefore, a good deal taken aback when she said, "Adrian, will you do me a great favour? I will never ask such a thing of you again—only this once. Will you, for my sake, give up Lady St. Austell altogether?"

"No," answered Adrian, quite good-humouredly, but firmly; "I will do nothing of the sort. Lady St. Austell has been kind to me, and to you too. I shall neither be so rude as to quarrel with her, nor so foolish as to quarrrel with you on her account. If you could see her with my eyes, you would be the first to laugh at yourself for having been afraid of her; but I am not going to say another word about the woman—what is the use? Now, go to bed, like a good girl, and let me get back to my work, or I shall be late with my copy again, and the editor of the Cosmopolitan Magazine will tear me limb from limb."

This off-hand way of dismissing the matter was so far successful that Clare smiled and allowed herself to be embraced. Nevertheless, after her husband had gone, she resolved that she would keep her word and never ask a favour of him again. It is difficult to be patient with those who meet trouble half way, and it is easy to see the absurdity of instinctive antipathies. Yet a woman's instinct does not often lead her astray, and we, who are wise and guided solely by principles of common-sense in all our dealings, may perhaps afford to spare a little sympathy for foolish people like Clare Vidal, remembering that the trials which they bring upon themselves are not the less real because of their folly.

Not many days after Clare had been so deservedly worsted in her effort to set instinct above reason, a trial came upon her which to one of her mental tendencies was especially hard to bear. Had Adrian been at home when the second post came in, he would probably have seen from her face that something was the matter; his inquiries would have elicited the truth, and a sufficiently clumsy attempt to sow discord between husband and wife would have been defeated. But, as ill-luck would have it, he had left the house, and it was in solitude that Clare opened and read the following precious missive:—

"Do you know how your husband amuses himself when your back is turned? Ask him how many times he has been in Grosvenor-square this week, and if he answers you truly he must have changed from what he used to be. You are not the first woman whom he has deceived, and you will not be the last. One who knows him well advises you to keep him at home if you can."

Clare treated this anonymous letter as it is to be feared that very many of us treat such stabs in the dark. First, she examined it closely, and found that neither handwriting nor post-mark afforded any clue to the identity of the writer. Then she indignantly tore it into fragments and threw it away from her, determining to think no more about it. And then she sat down and thought about it. Clare knew, as everybody knows, that anonymous letters can only be prompted by malice, and that the fact of their being anonymous is strong presumptive evidence that the matter which they contain is false. So far, so good; but she could not help going a little farther and arguing that malice must have some cause or other for its existence. "You are not the first woman whom he has deceived." His own mother had said something very like this about him, and in that charge lay the poison of the letter. It had come, no doubt, from some woman who had been deceived, or considered herself to have been deceived, by Adrian in days gone by, and who was thus taking the first opportunity that offered to avenge herself upon him. Who was this woman? The insinuation that Adrian was visiting Lady St. Austell more frequently than he confessed might or might not be founded upon fact. In any case, Clare felt that she was bound to assume it to be untrue. The least that she could do (so she rather foolishly thought) was to say nothing to her husband about this backbiting communication, and to behave as though it had never reached her. She despised herself for giving it a second thought; but self-contempt does not always lead to change of conduct; and so, while she condemned her suspicions, she brooded over them until she fretted herself into a fever.

Miss Susan Bowman possessed a fine supply of hatred and malice, and in the vengeance which she had sworn to wreak upon Vidal she was quite ready and willing to include Vidal's wife; yet—since, with all her little defects, she was a woman—it is probable that she would not have dispatched the document quoted above, had she been able to foresee all the consequences of that action. Adrian came home to find his small household in a state of the greatest confusion and alarm, and the doctor, who had been summoned hastily, pulled a rather long face when he came out of Mrs. Vidal's room.

"I think you had better go down stairs for the present," he said to Adrian. "I will join you as soon as I am able to leave my patient; but that may not be for some hours. Perhaps you would like to telegraph for Mrs. Irvine."

"Is it so bad as that?" gasped Vidal, turning white.

The doctor assumed that look of annoyed surprise which doctors generally do assume when such questions are addressed to them, and said: "I understood that Mrs. Vidal wished her mother to be with her, that was all. Of course, this is happening a great deal sooner than it ought to have done, which gives us some additional cause for anxiety; but I did not intend to imply anything more."

Thereupon he withdrew hastily; and Adrian, having dispatched his telegram, betook himself to his study, where he sat, waiting and trembling, for an interminable hour. At last he heard a heavy footfall on the stairs, and presently the doctor entered, with a grave and sympathetic mien.

"I am sorry," he began, "that I am not the bearer of good news."

Adrian started up and caught the man by the elbows. "Well?—what?" he asked, fiercely.

"I regret to say that the child was born dead. Under the circumstances, that was only what might have been anticipated; still"——

"Hang the child!" burst out Adrian. "What about my wife? Will she live?"

The doctor disengaged himself, looking slightly shocked. "Oh, I hope so—I quite hope so," he replied. "I have no reason to think otherwise. But it is a great pity that matters should have fallen out like this. Can you account for it in any way? Has Mrs. Vidal had any shock?—any mental disturbance?"

"None whatever, that I am aware of," answered Adrian.

The doctor said no more, but appeared to be incredulous. Adrian saw that he thought there had been a quarrel between the young couple; but he did not care what the doctor thought, nor did it occur to him to make any inquiry as to the presumed shock which had deprived him of the joys of paternity. All that he thought of then and for the next three days was his wife's chance of recovery, and when she was pronounced to be out of danger, he could hardly contain himself for joy.

Clare, who was too weak to speak much, lay and watched his happy face with a smile of contentment upon her own. "He must love me, to be so glad," she thought; and so long as he loved her, she asked for nothing more. She could have wished that he had been able to enter a little more into her feeling of disappointment about the baby; but it was hardly to be expected that a man should understand that. In reality, Adrian did, to some extent, understand what her feelings must be, but thought it better not to touch upon that subject. Personally, he shared the views of Mrs. Irvine, who concealed her own disappointment beneath a mask of cheerful volubility, and who confided to him that, much as she would have liked to be a grandmother, she could not but feel that this first member of the third generation had been rightly served for entering the world with such undue precipitancy.

"So inconsiderate of him!" she said. "I dare say, if he had lived, he would have brought an immensity of trouble upon us all with his impetuous ways of going on. Even as it is, he has given me a dreadful fright, besides upsetting all my arrangements. I had promised myself a month in London towards the end of the season, and I thought that by the time Clare was strong again, you would be ready for your summer holiday and I could take you both back to Cardrew with me; but now I must return as soon as possible on account of a hundred things that have to be attended to at home; and as for nursing poor Clare and doing all that I want to do in London, it isn't to be thought of. So I have written to Mr. Irvine to come up. No, I won't have him in this house; he would only be in your way. He will stay in a little hotel in Albemarle-street, where they know him and will look after him; and then he must go about and do my commissions for me. A nice mess he will make of them, I am afraid, but we must hope for the best."

In obedience to this summons, Mr. Irving duly arrived in Albemarle-street, whence it was agreed that he was to journey out to Alexandra-gardens every morning to be informed of his daughter's progress towards recovery, and to receive his wife's orders for the day. As, however, he persisted in walking the whole distance, and as on three consecutive occasions he lost his way, and only appeared in tow of a friendly policeman at three o'clock in the afternoon, by which time he was far too exhausted to be sent anywhere, it was considered that time would be saved by sending him his daily instructions through the post for the future. In spite of the element of risk involved in such an arrangement (for the old gentleman never remembered to post a letter himself, and when two or three days elapsed without news of him it was impossible not to fear that he might have been decoyed into a back slum and murdered), Mrs. Irvine adhered to it loyally and only left her daughter's bedside when Clare insisted upon her giving herself a little fresh air.

Adrian, too, remained at home during the greater part of the twenty-four hours, neither dining out nor paying visits, and making the office of the Anglo-Saxon the sole object of his afternoon walk. However, when Clare was in a fair way towards convalescence, he bethought him that it would be only civil to call upon Lady St. Austell, who had sent repeatedly to inquire during Mrs. Vidal's illness, and from whom he had received various sympathetic little notes, to which he had replied, without thinking it necessary to mention them to the invalid. Turning into Grosvenor-square, one afternoon, to discharge this act of duty, he was surprised to see his father-in-law standing on the steps of the house for which he himself was bound. Mr. Irvine was apparently lost in thought, but recognised the new-comer with a gesture of delight.

"Dear me! is that you, Adrian? Now perhaps you will be able to help me out. I have, unfortunately, quite forgotten, for the moment"——

"Where you are and what you came here for," suggested Adrian, laughing. "Well, I think I can tell you. You came here to call on Lady St. Austell, and you are now at her door."

"Yes, yes; I know that—I am quite aware of that; and I can also recall the specific errand upon which I was sent by Mrs. Irvine. She has lately supplied Lady St. Austell with a maid—a most respectable person, who has seen better days, but is now in reduced circumstances—and I was to inquire how she was getting on. But my difficulty is this. If Lady St. Austell was not at home, I was to be sure to ask for the young woman herself, and unluckily her name has altogether escaped me. It couldn't be Arrowroot, could it?"

"I shouldn't think so," said Adrian.

"No; and yet that can't be far from it, because all the way down Bond-street I was trying to fix it in my mind by repeating to myself 'A was an Archer, who shot at a frog.' Now, the name was not Archer."

"I don't see how that would help you towards Arrowroot, except that the words begin with an A," remarked Adrian. "Would the frog be of any assistance, do you think?"

Mr. Irvine shook his head despondently. "I doubt it. I can call to mind no English surname that is connected in any way with the idea of a frog, unless it be Tadpole, and I should be sorry to assert positively that such a name as Tadpole exists. Added to which, Tadpole is certainly not the name of the young person."

"That being so, suppose we ring and ask for the new maid?"

"To be sure!" cried Mr. Irvine, gleefully. "We will do so without loss of time. What a fortunate thing that you should have arrived at this moment! You are always so fertile in expedients."

Adrian accordingly rang the bell, and during the interval that elapsed before the door was opened he had leisure to reflect that, from his point of view, it was perhaps not such a very fortunate thing that he had encountered his father-in-law at that particular time and place. He had not said, before leaving home, that he intended calling upon Lady St. Austell, and would have been just as well pleased that the circumstance should not be reported. His musings were interrupted by a sudden exclamation from Mr. Irvine.

"Bowman!" called out the old gentleman, triumphantly. "Susan Bowman, of course! I knew it had something to do with archery. Now, do you see the beauty of this system of memoria technica? It not only enables you to recall the particular word that you wish to retain, but it exercises the deductive and inductive faculties"——

But the remainder of Mr. Irvine's speech died away upon his lips when he discovered that his hearer had vanished, as if by enchantment.

Adrian was, indeed, at this moment posting along Upper Brook-street, uttering muffled execrations at every step. Susan Bowman in Lady St. Austell's service! Here was a pretty piece of business! "No more visits to Grosvenor-square for me!" thought he to himself. "That dear old mother-in-law of mine is the best of women; but she is not happy in her choice of objects for benevolence. I suppose the next thing will be that she will hear the whole of Susan's sad story, with additions and embellishments. Heaven grant that the woman may not have found out Clare's maiden name! It is this sort of disastrous thing that makes one doubt whether Providence can really take any active part in the government of human affairs."

The wicked flee when no man pursueth. Perhaps so; but there have been circumstances under which the righteous have been known to adopt the same inglorious system of strategy. It cannot be said that Adrian had behaved wickedly towards Susan Bowman; yet so terrified was he at the prospect of a second encounter with her that he was half way across Hyde Park before he realised that he had done a rather stupid thing in decamping without assigning any cause for his retreat. It would have been so simple to have been taken ill, or to have remembered an appointment! However, there was no use in thinking about that now, and he could but trust that Mr. Irvine's treacherous memory might fail to retain the circumstances of their meeting and parting. What was more important was that a woman who ardently desired to do him an ill turn was residing in the house which, of all houses in London, seemed the most likely to furnish her with means to effect her purpose; and as he thought of the complications that might arise out of this most unlucky accident, Adrian almost made up his mind that he would not only steer clear of Lady St. Austell for the future, but would frankly tell his wife the whole history of that boyish adventure which had so nearly prevented her from ever becoming his wife at all.

That he did not, in the sequel, carry out this sensible determination was due to a succession of those second thoughts which are not always the best. He had a good many reasons for holding his tongue. No man likes to confess (except in general terms) that he has been an egregious ass; very few men care to run the risk of a scene which may be avoided; and if it only cost an occasional ten-pound note to keep Susan quiet, occasional ten-pound notes might very well be forthcoming in these palmy days of literary success. Moreover, when he had regained full possession of his senses, Adrian reflected that the chance of a visitor to a large establishment being seen by the lady's-maid was not to be reckoned, upon the average, at a much higher rate than one in fifty, and that, as he had escaped recognition hitherto, it was most probable that he would continue to do so. To all this it may be added that he did not want to break with Lady St. Austell.

Had he been a little better acquainted with the habits both of Lady St. Austell and Susan, he might have spared himself the trouble of debating whether or not it behoved him to be cautious about calling in Grosvenor-square. The former of these women was at all times possessed by so irresistible a craving to talk about herself that it would have been impossible for anyone to brush her hair every evening without hearing all that she knew as to the person who had the privilege of exciting her interest for the time being: the latter had an insatiable thirst for information, having long since discovered ways in which miscellaneous information may be turned to account. Susan, therefore, was perfectly aware not only that Adrian was the son-in-law of the lady who had provided her with her situation, but also that Mrs. Vidal was rather prone to be jealous of her husband, and that Lady St. Austell was by no means disinclined to give her good cause for being so.

This was most satisfactory, and Susan began to see her way to paying off old scores in that time-honoured fashion which ought always to fail, yet so seldom does fail. That Mrs. Vidal might very possibly show the anonymous letter which she had received to her husband was a contingency in no wise to be dreaded. The writer did not care in the least whether she was identified by Adrian or not; for, since her interview with him, she had felt assured that he lacked the requisite courage to speak the truth about his past. He would, therefore (so she calculated), meet this charge with a blank denial—which denial would be only half believed in. He would not cease to visit Lady St. Austell; but henceforth he would do so more or less on the sly, and sooner or late he was quite sure, if not to compromise himself, at least to place himself in a compromising situation. Thus there was good ground for hope that ere long he might be made acquainted with the sweet uses of adversity. In the meantime, it was not desirable that he should be put upon his guard by knowledge of his enemy's whereabouts, and that knowledge Susan accordingly determined to withhold from him. Should he by any chance acquire it, she would still have the whip-hand of him; for she had preserved certain affectionate letters of his, written in by-gone days, and she was not without hope that, as time went on, she might do still better and possess herself of similar missives addressed to Lady St. Austell. It will be perceived that Miss Bowman was neither over-strict as to her own moral code nor disposed to form too lofty a notion of that of her neighbours.

"She is," said Mrs. Irvine, speaking of her to Adrian at this time, "one of the most interesting and unfortunate creatures I have ever met. I would have tried to place her as a governess; but she said she really would prefer being a maid, and one can't wonder that she should, poor thing! Nowadays, so much is expected of governesses that she could not hope to be intrusted with the care of any but quite small children, and, as she very truly said, it is better to be a lady's-maid than a nurse. I don't think there are any people in the world whom I pity so much as those who are thrown upon their own resources after having been brought up as ladies and yet insufficiently educated."

"I suppose you satisfied yourself that she had been brought up as a lady," said Adrian, to whom all this was very unpleasant hearing.

"Well, she said so," answered Mrs. Irvine, as if that were quite conclusive, and added, after a moment: "Sometimes I feel almost inclined to give up belonging to charitable organisations altogether: they seem to make people so hard and suspicious. This poor woman came to the office of our Society for the Aid of Decayed Gentlewomen, and they would have nothing to say to her because she couldn't produce any relations to answer for her. Now, how is one to produce people who are dead and buried? One can't dig them up out of their graves: and she did offer to show us their tombstones, which Lady M'Cleverty said was so impertinent of her, though I really could not see myself why it was impertinent. She told me her whole story, which was really a very sad and touching one. The lady with whom she lived first, after her parents died, turned her out of doors and refused to help her to another place because she had been unfortunate enough to attract the attention of this lady's son—a dissolute and unprincipled young man. Then, I think, she said she had been a dressmaker, and—well, I don't remember all her adventures; but she managed at last to get a situation as nursery-governess, and only left it because she could not endure the vulgarity of the people."

Adrian groaned. "And upon the strength of that unsupported testimony you recommended her to Lady St. Austell?"

"It wasn't unsupported. I had a character of her from the people with whom she had been last. Not a very good character, I must admit; but it was easy to see that the woman who wrote it was prejudiced against her. At any rate, Lady St. Austell is quite satisfied."

Adrian did not care to pursue the subject. It was a relief to him to find that he had not yet been betrayed, and it was also something of a relief to him when Mrs. Irvine left for Cornwall. "If there is to be a disturbance," thought he, "the fewer there are of us to take part in it the better."

But before very long all dread of a disturbance left him. Susan made no sign, and Clare, though a little depressed—as was but natural, after all that she had gone through—was almost herself again, and seemed to have forgotten the unreasoning repugnance that she had felt for Lady St. Austell. In reality, Clare had forgotten nothing; but Adrian's care of her during her illness had made her so heartily ashamed of having doubted him that she was eager to show her penitence by urging him to go out into the world again;—which thing, to tell the truth, he was ready to do without any great pressure. She herself did not yet feel equal to the fatigue of being entertained again; so she remained at home, counting the days till August, in the beginning of which month Adrian was to take her down to Cardrew, and sometimes wishing that she had a friend with her to keep her company and aid the flight of time.

"THOSE LAUGH WHO WIN."

This homely proverb may be as true of a game of chess as of any other game, if the comparative seriousness of a true contest of pure skill and science, admitting with able players little of the element of mere chance, does not temper the risibility of a sudden triumph. The defeated party is not likely to be in the laughing mood either in a game of chance or in a trial of skill; but it may depend on the personal disposition of the winner, young or old, proud or modest, whether a victory gained partly by good luck, as in holding a favourable hand of cards or in making a fortunate throw of dice, has the same exhilarating effect on his mind as a success achieved by wise strategy and tactics in an equal fight of no accidental character. There is this difference, we have often thought, between Chess and Whist, the two best of all sedentary games; for the latter will depend in some measure, at least for the single trick, and perhaps for the game or the total rubber, on the distribution of cards at hazard from the dealer; while the first-rate chessplayer, whose every move is a predetermined step towards the accomplishment of a certain design, like Field-Marshal Count von Moltke when he is directing the German Army, owes nothing to fortune except the possible blunders of an inferior opponent. Young players, in general, prefer a mixture of chance with skill, and enjoy the fun of winning by their luck, which to the juvenile mind is a flattering experience, though not accompanied by the just consciousness of merit. It is quite otherwise, we perceive, with this veteran master of crafty combinations, the old-fashioned parson, attired in the wig and gown commonly worn in Dean Swift's days by clergymen even in their hours of domestic relaxation, who has defeated his friend, a military officer, in the mimic battle of the chequered board, portrayed by a clever Artist in the drawing we have engraved. The reverend gentleman is perfectly satisfied with himself; the secure complacency of his face and attitude, the egotistic serenity of his smile, and the peculiar balancing of his finger-tips against each other, are very expressive of the sense of intellectual superiority, of having out-manœuvred his antagonist, without the slightest recognition of chance or luck in their contest. This is true chessplaying, which has frequently been noticed to be the congenial pastime of men gifted with a power of mental concentration, of mathematicians and philosophers, as well as statesmen, generals, and other great men of business; some of the last-mentioned classes, indeed, are known to have been addicted rather to whist, because it involves the practical element of hazard, as in most affairs of real life, and the social interest of partnership or co-operation, together with that of contention against the adverse party. The man of solitary studies, a severe metaphysician, grammarian, or theologian for instance, may prove a formidable opponent at the chessboard; and our clerical acquaintance here, in spite of his steaming bowl of punch, is perhaps one of the most learned divines of his time. The other player, for aught we know, may have commanded a brigade in the wars of the Duke of Marlborough and earned high military reputation, but here sits beaten by the Parson, and it is the Parson who laughs as he wins.

Her Majesty's Government have awarded silver shipwreck medals to Custodio Otazo, a pilot of Pasages; Quiterio Letamendia, a skipper; Enrique Mariscal, the Alcalde of Pasages, and Ramon Llanos, a councilman, who went out in two boats from the port of Pasages, manned by crews of ten and six men respectively, to the rescue of the shipwrecked crew of the British steam-ship Coldra, which was driven upon some rocks near the entrance to the port, under high cliffs, during a hurricane. They succeeded, at great risk, in saving the lives of the master and eight of the crew of the steam-ship. A gold shipwreck medal has also been awarded to Don Domingo Parlaty, captain of the port of Pasages, who went out in another boat and helped to pick up some of the men belonging to French and Spanish men-of-war's boats which capsized when attempting to take part in the rescue of the crew of the Coldra. The Board of Trade have awarded sums of money to the crews of the two first-mentioned boats, and also to José Martin Corto, José Mario Urbietta Ciriaco, Anton Colvo, and four seamen who saved the lives of the survivors of the crew of the steam-ship Coldra, who remained on board the wreck until night, by pulling them up the cliffs with ropes.

By FRITZ HOFFMANN (Munich).
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play, and mate in three moves.

We are glad to note that the proprietors of the Australasian, of Melbourne, have made arrangements with Mr. Blackburne to contribute the best of the games played by him in the Colonies, with his own notes. Since his "blindfold" exhibition Mr. Blackburne has been resting, preparatory to a visit to Warmambool, where he will be the guest of Mr. Stanley. From thence he goes to Ballarat, and will enter into the players at the Mechanic's Institution. At the Melbourne chess clubs Mr. Blackburne has been a welcome visitor, and a crowd around a board is a sure indication of his presence. The following is one of the ten games played by Mr. Blackburne sans voir, referred to a few weeks back, with his own notes. It is quoted from the Australasian.

(King's Gambit declined.)

WHITE (Mr. Blackburne).	BLACK (Mr. Loughran).	WHITE (Mr. Blackburne).	BLACK (Mr. Loughran).

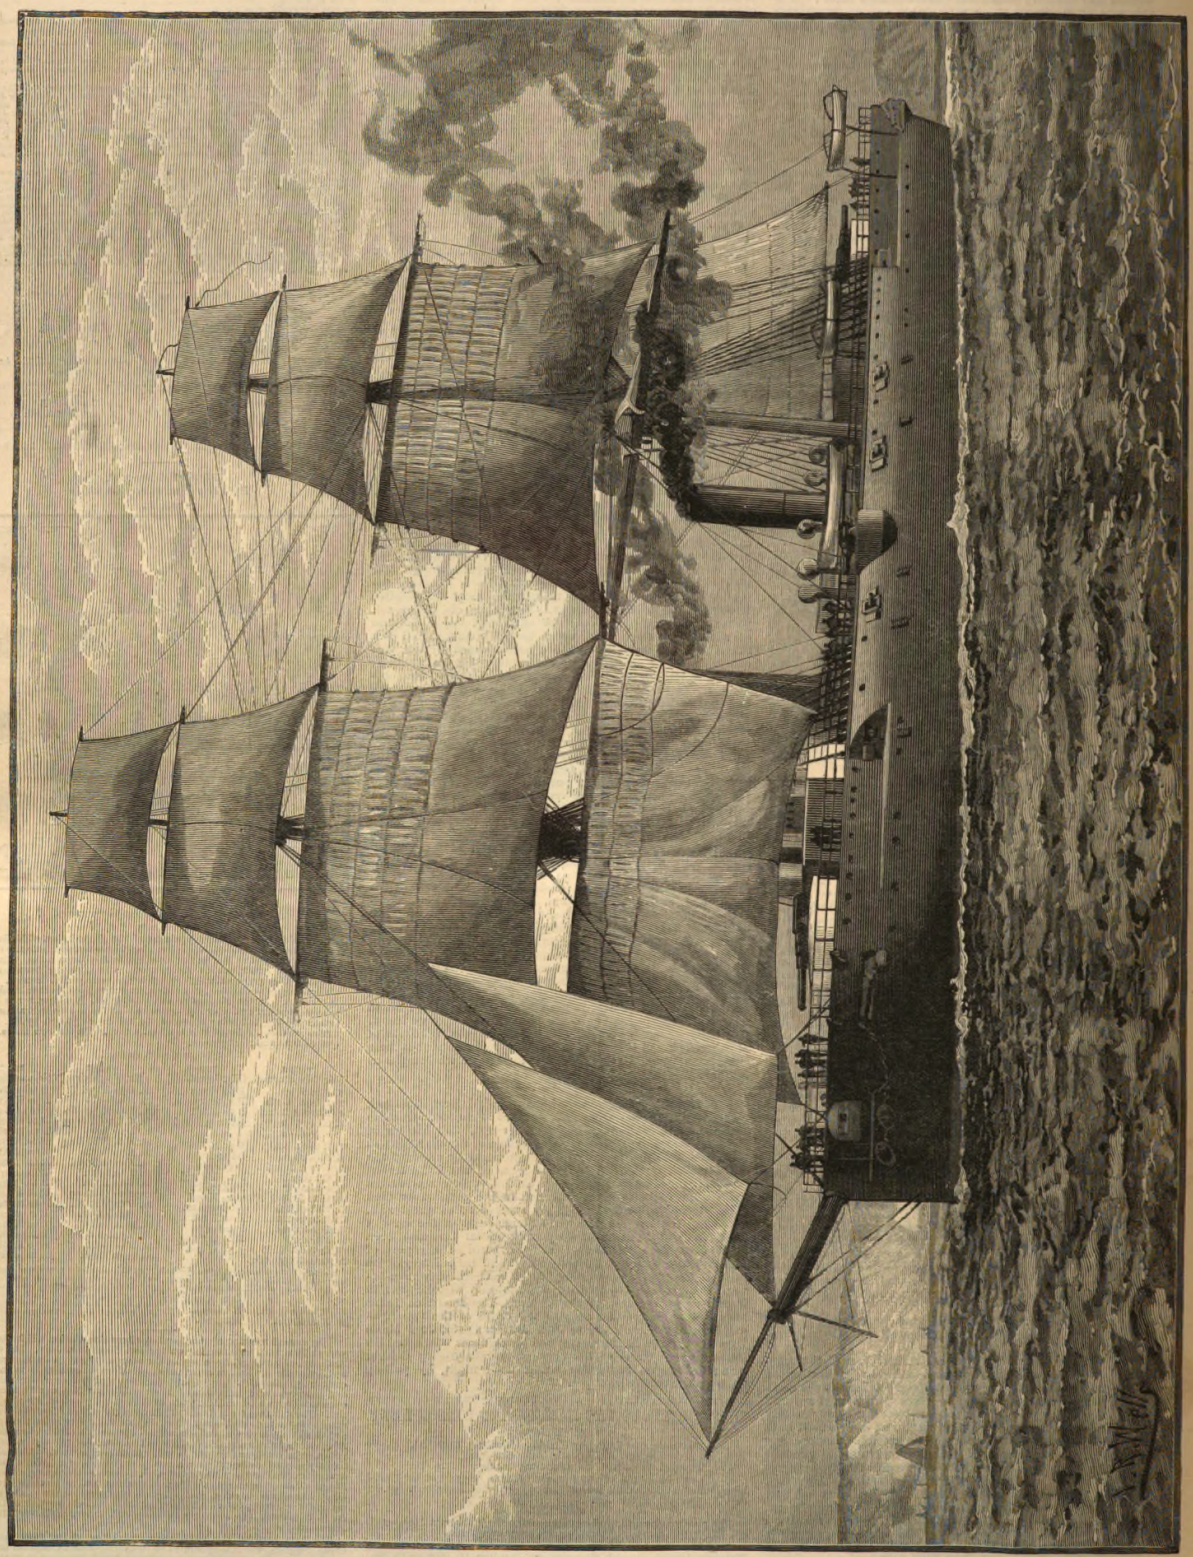
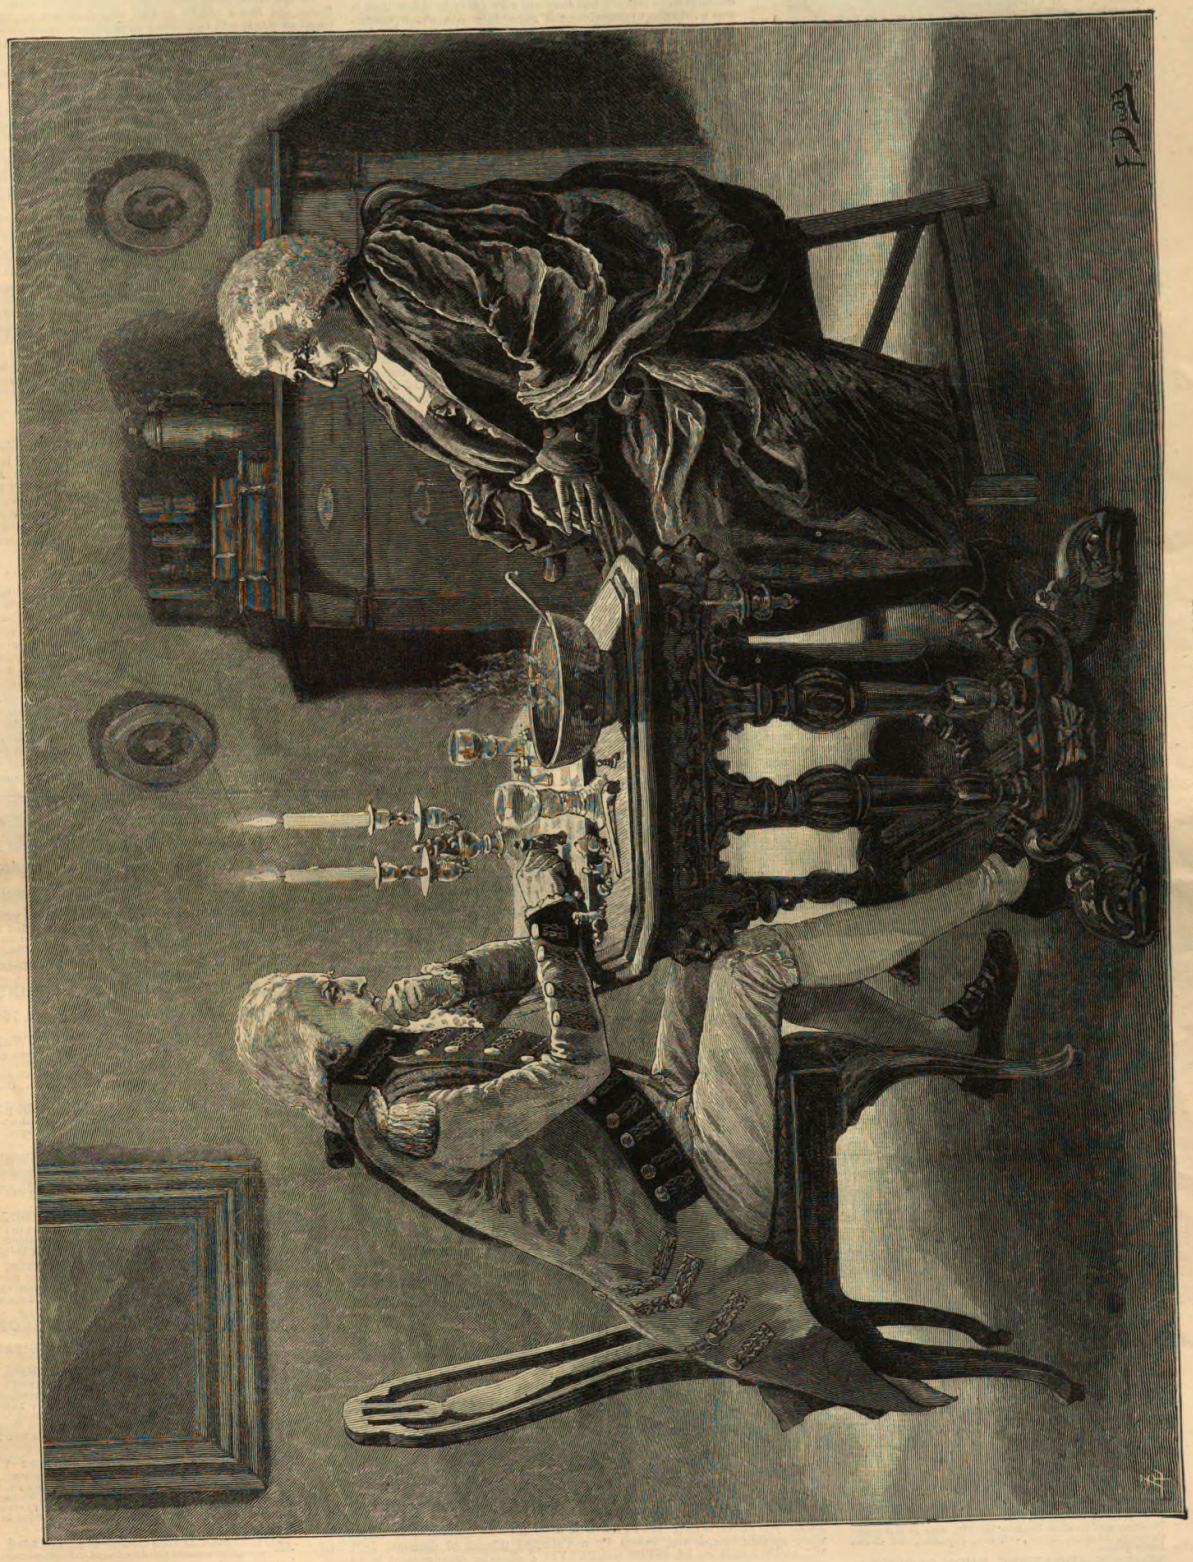
15. Q takes Kt P	K to Q 2nd	34. P takes R	R to K 5th (ch)
16. Q to Kt 4th (ch)		35. K to K 3rd	K takes P



When he made this move, he overlooked that Black could interpose his queen. 16. K to K B sq would have won easily.

At this point the game was abandoned as drawn. Mr. Blackburne observes that "Black's defence throughout this game is a critical end game is of the highest order; for, with a Pawn minus, and apparently the worse position, he succeeds in obtaining a draw."



The annual meeting of the Counties Chess Association will be held this year at Hereford, commencing on the last Monday in July. Mr. Charles Anthony, of Hereford, has accepted the office of president for the year, and by his munificence and in anticipation of a liberal response from the chess community generally, the committee are enabled to issue a very attractive and comprehensive programme. There will be a "Master's" tournament, open to all nations, for a first prize of at least £50; second, £20; and third, £10. The entrance fee is fixed at £3 3s., and the sum of these will be divided among the unsuccessful competitors. There will be the usual first, second, and third class tourneys, and a handicap, open only to British amateurs, the first prize to be at least £15; and £10 will be given for problem and solution prizes. The amateur competition will extend over a week, but the Master's tourney may be prolonged over a fortnight if necessary. While £50 is the sum guaranteed for the "Master's" prize, the committee express a desire that liberal donations may be offered to enable them to increase it, so that competitors from America, and other distant parts of the world, may be induced to enter the lists. All cheques should be made payable to the Rev. A. B. Skipworth, the honorary secretary and treasurer, Tetford Rectory, Horncastle.

We have received the preliminary prospectus of the Sixth American Chess Congress, which is appointed to be held at New Orleans on or about April 7 next. The programme comprises a grand tournament, open to all comers, at a moderate entrance fee, the prize pal prize to be not less than £100, and the others to be in pro rotion to the number of competitors; a handicap and problem tourney, each for appropriate prizes. The prospectus is dated Feb. 7 last, and the committee append to it a note that, if by March 15 they have not received subscriptions sufficient to ensure the success of the congress, the project will be abandoned.

A new chess club has been formed, which holds its meetings at the Bedford Tavern, Red Lion-street. A noteworthy clause in the constitution of this young society is, that there are no subscriptions expected from the members. Mr. R. Moffat and Mr. H. T. Down, well-known metropolitan amateurs, are among the regular attendants.

"THOSE LAUGH WHO WIN."—DRAWN BY F. DADD.

POETRY.

Something more than the mere elegant, cultivated master of rhyme, something more than the accomplished versifier and controller of rhythm, something very near akin to the true poet, though not, perhaps, of the highest or the profoundest flight, is revealed in The Secret of Death, &c.: by Edwin Arnold, M.A. (Trübner and Co.), and has before now been revealed in "The Light of Asia," as well as in less interesting and less ambitious specimens of poetic thought and workmanship. It is always pleasant and even improving to read the productions of a writer who, whether he be translating, or paraphrasing, or pouring forth the original utterances of a genuine inspiration, gives continual proof of scholarship combined with taste, and of a heart that has been chastened by experience and is in cordial sympathy with the joys, the sorrows, and the yearnings of humanity. And, now that scholarship has been mentioned, it is pertinent to remark that the author follows the fashion of the classical poets, who may be said, in vulgar parlance, to have had "a good cheek" and to have been in many cases their own "trumpeters." So the author, in the style of the self-complacent Horatius Flaccus, who roundly proclaimed that he had "erected a monument more durable than brass" (a very good metal to pick out under the circumstances), and that he should not "all" die, but that a great part of him would still "escape Libitina," declares in some pretty dedicatory verses inscribed to his daughter his firm conviction, amounting to absolute knowledge, that his "verse shall henceforth live on lips to be." This self-assertion, though scarcely after the modern mode, is very much better, no doubt, than the veil of hypocritical modesty which is so generally assumed; though, in either case, self-consciousness is somewhat ridiculously betrayed. Neither the tone of Peter in the "Tale of a Tub," nor of Uriah Heap in a well-known novel, will cause vitality or immortality to be attained by poems otherwise destined to fall still-born from the press, or to sink hereafter into oblivion. In the present instance, the author had no reason, unless it had so pleased him, to take the trumpet into his own hand and blow into it from his own mouth; he has not been treated as the prophet, if not the poet, is proverbially (and therefore, one is almost inclined to say, falsely) said to be treated in his own country; his poetical effusions have met with extensive, and deservedly extensive, appreciation in his own generation among his own compatriots; and how his merits, whether as a poet or in some other capacity, have been recognised by various persons or bodies who have authority and preside at divers fountains of honour, is to be inferred from the long list of distinctions—too long by far to quote—which, as appears plainly on the titlepage, have been conferred upon him from time to time: why, a Homer would have been bewildered by a half of them. The contents of the volume are diverse, and so numerous that it would be vain to attempt the briefest description of them all; suffice it to say that there are poems, original and translated, in blank verse and in rhyme, of the epic and of the lyric order, in the didactic and in many an other strain; that the writer is good, and sometimes very good, both as the singer of the thoughts that arose in him and as the simple interpreter of others; and that he excels rather in the plaintive mood and the pretty, polished form than in any other. He has drawn upon the treasures of Sanscrit, Greek, Latin, French, and German for his varied and interesting collection; and his touch is that not only of a cunning hand but of one who feels that respect is due to what he touches. The titular poem is taken from the Sanscrit, and is in the shape of a lesson conned together, as it were, by a Brahman priest and an Englishman, who, seated in a temple beside a river near the city of Poonah, read together—with comments—part of a Sanscrit manuscript. English readers will be greatly struck and, perhaps, impressed with the sentiments and theories propounded, as well as with the customs which receive incidental illustration; but they are very likely to think that it was a mistake to introduce the Sanscrit words, which, sesquipedalian as some of them are, may not have on everybody ignorant of the language the soothing effect produced upon the illiterate old woman by "that blessed word Mesopotamia."

A poetical subject poetically handled is to be found in Melchior: by W. G. Wills (Macmillan and Co.), which is a romantic story told in the blank verse of the period. The blank verse of the period is an expression used advisedly; because the writers, the most indubitable poets even, of the present age seem to deal with blank verse, as regards syllables and accents, in a free-and-easy manner which is calculated to discolour the hair and undermine the constitution of readers who were brought up in the old school. It is all right, no doubt, but the sensation caused is sometimes like that experienced in a drive over a rutty road; and it is all right, again, no doubt, to take any unoffending substantive and enlist it by force in the army of verbs, or, with the addition of one or two letters, in a regiment of adjectives or participles; but just at first the appearance of such a phenomenon is apt to excite prejudice, to provoke an exclamation as at a sudden shock. Such little liberties, if, indeed, they be even liberties at all, have, nevertheless, a highly poetical look; and, sooth to say, that is sometimes all that there is of poetical in a whole volume of so-called poetry. It is very different with "Melchior," which could very well afford to do without the eccentricities (as the old school would call them) both of metrical arrangement and of language, and would still remain with passages of picturesque description, of striking fancy, of tender passion, of strong emotion, of brilliant conception, of eloquent expression, sufficient to vindicate its claims. The writer has chosen his scene well; it is a dreamy old town on the Rhine, as it was at some date not clearly given. There lived Melchior von Stern, a mystic, a musician, yet a man of fortune. He was all that was good and kind, and he was a true son of St. Cecilia, his patron saint. His ambition was to win fame by an oratorio written in her honour; it was a magnificent masterpiece, but, at the opening of the story, it had just failed to take the popular fancy. Melchior is called a Geister-seher (which is invariably written in the hardly defensible hybrid form "Geister-seer"), from his supposed communion with spirits, especially with the spirit of St. Cecilia, and his disregard of earthly matters. On a day, or rather night, he, being out in a boat, fishes out of the Rhine a woman who would have drowned herself, a woman of lovely exterior and, as it turns out, of lovely nature, mental and moral. Of course, they love; and the question is whether she on earth shall win Melchior from St. Cecilia in heaven. But, lo! when he proposes to marry the beauty of flesh and blood, it appears that she has a mysterious secret which is a bar to any such happiness; she then appears to have drowned herself really, in a second attempt, but she is only acting a part; she presents herself before Melchior, who has gone mad, and he shoots her dead; he is confined as a maniac in his own house, where he recovers nearly all his senses, lives in spiritual communication with the mysterious young woman he had shot, and, just when news is brought to him that his masterpiece has at last found full appreciation, he dies on the very day, at about the very hour he had been led to expect, after he had encountered his "double." Such a story lends itself easily to poetical treatment; and poetically it is treated—very poetically, from time to time.

If the anonymous writer of the volume of verse entitled Sturm und Drang (Elliot Stock), who does not appear to be very conceited, will be content with a place among the minor but by no means inconsiderable English lyrists, let the place be claimed at once as of right. The verses are easy and melodious for the most part; and if there is only very occasionally a rare, original thought or image, there is very often plenty of spirit and vigour. The writer's tone is sometimes more than a little bitter; and he evidently takes a most hopeless view, notwithstanding his discernible sympathy, of the social and moral condition which prevails among the poor of London. It is not easy to see how anybody can very well take any other view; but to have it so strongly presented makes it doubly distressing from the feeling of utter despair confessed and communicated. In the pieces called "Lux per tenebras" and "My Muse and I," respectively, the writer has struck the lyre to very noticeable purpose, and in other pieces also.

A wild bird sitting on a tree, unwitting of lucid composition and small grammatical detail, but full of tempestuous ardour, might trill forth to entertain his mate, such passionate, tumultuous, unintelligible little bursts of amorous song as are contained in Tuberose and Meadowsweet: by Mark André Raffalovich (David Bogue), of which volume the very title itself is poetry. It would be sheer affectation to pretend to understand more than a very small appreciable fraction of the many pieces the volume contains, but some of them are certainly very pretty, some very passionate, some very plaintive, and if they be not poetry, they have all the appearance of it, and are at least ebullient song.

H.M.S. IMPÉRIEUSE.

The Impérieuse and her sister-ship, the Warspite, are designed as fast cruisers, carrying four heavy revolving guns in barbette towers, and capable of being fired in any direction, besides six lighter guns. Each ship will be able to carry 900 tons of coal, and to steam at the rate of sixteen knots an hour. These ships are brig-rigged, carrying a large spread of canvas for cruising. The dimensions of the ship are—length, 315 ft.; displacement, 7300 tons.

Mr. Thomas Russell was last week elected, without opposition, for Glasgow, in succession to Mr. George Anderson, who has been appointed to a Crown Office at Melbourne.

The annual general meeting of the Booksellers' Provident Institution was held on the 12th inst., Mr. Robert Farran in the chair. The report of the directors, which was unanimously adopted, expressed some concern as to the future welfare of the institution, arising from insufficiency of income to meet requirements. The total receipts during the year amounted to £1622, which included a donation of £20 from her Majesty (patroness of the institution), and a legacy of £100 from the late Mr. H. G. Bohn. The expenditure during the same period had been £1652, of which £1455 was disbursed in relief granted to twenty-seven members and fifty-two widows of members, and £196 expenses of management. The report concludes by earnestly appealing for liberal subscriptions.

GORDON'S NATIVE SOLDIERS CARRYING THE WOUNDED TO KORTI.
SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. MELTON PRIOR.

Although the annual contest, as it has for many years now been, between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge on the Thames from Putney to Mortlake (or just the other way), has happily lost some of the absurd factitious importance once attached to it, it is just at present a topic of considerable interest. It may, therefore, be worth while to notice a few points which are constantly discussed on the eve of the race. It is usual to date the series—which has been annual since 1856 only—from 1829, when Oxford won. But that race was rowed at Henley, and ought, of course, to be included among "University meetings at Henley," of which there have been five besides. There was also a race between Oxford and Cambridge (won by the former) at the Thames Regatta, in June, 1844. The University boat-race proper, however, so to speak, has been rowed altogether forty times, of which Oxford has won twenty-one, and Cambridge eighteen. There was one dead-heat (in 1877, when Oxford was winning easily, but bow broke his oar). In 1836, 1839, 1840, 1841, and 1842, the course was from Westminster to Putney; and Cambridge won the first four of the five races. Once, in 1846, the race was rowed from Mortlake to Putney, and was won by Cambridge. Twice—in 1856 and 1863—the race was rowed from "Barker's rails" (1200 yards beyond the usual post at Mortlake) to Putney, and was won in the former year by Cambridge, in the latter by Oxford. On all other occasions it has been rowed from Putney to Mortlake. In 1831 the prevalence of cholera prevented the race from being rowed; in 1834, disagreement about locality; in 1835, continued non-acceptance of the challenge of 1834. Since 1836, the only years in which there was no race have been 1837, 1838, 1843, 1844, 1847, 1848, 1850, 1851, 1853, and 1855. In 1846 outriggers (initiated on the Tyne) were first used; in 1857, keel-less boats; in 1873, slides. In 1849 there were two races in the course of the year; Cambridge won the first, Oxford the second, on a foul (the only time the race has been so won). The quickest time is that of Cambridge (in 1873, 19 min. 36 sec.), the first year of the slides, which have not, on the whole, made so much difference in the time as might have been expected; the slowest (since the old days of the Westminster to Putney race, of course) is also that of Cambridge (in 1860, 26 min. 5 sec.). The closest finish (bar the dead-heat) is, perhaps, the half-length by which Cambridge won in 1856, or Oxford in 1867; though, if the difference of course be taken into consideration, the two-thirds of a length by which Cambridge won from Westminster to Putney, in 1840, may be taken to show as gallant a struggle. In 1859, Cambridge, which has been rather unfortunate, filled and sank in the rough water. From 1861 to 1869, both included, the race degenerated into a procession, Oxford always leading. The race is generally rowed on the Saturday before Palm Sunday; but the year before last it was rowed on a Thursday, and last year on a Monday. In conclusion, the race for about a dozen years or more "followed the betting"—that is, the crew on whom betting men laid odds—won the race invariably, but either last year or the year before the "odds were upset," as the saying is, by one of those exceptions which are said to prove or test a general rule.

Berlin and birthdays have been much in men's mouths lately. On the 20th inst. there was Prince Frederic Charles, father-in-law of our Duke of Connaught, celebrating his fifty-seventh birthday; on the 22nd inst. there was the German Emperor's birthday, the eighty-eighth; and meanwhile, a subscription of more than eighty thousand pounds has been subscribed for a national testimonial to be presented to the "man of blood and iron" on his seventieth birthday—the First of April, of all days in the year. Prince Von Bismarck, however, is not to be presented with a "poisson d'Avril," but with the estate of Schönhausen, which one of his ancestors was obliged to sell some two centuries ago. This can hardly be considered a case of the return of the "bad shilling," even if it cannot be regarded as an instance of casting one's bread upon the waters.

Eighty-eight and seventy are, no doubt, respectable ages for an Emperor and a Prince, especially in these days of Nihilism and dynamite; but, now that Mr. Thoms and others have no terrors for the reporters of marvellous ages, a centenarian is coming to be regarded as little more than an "old boy." The other day, however, there came to hand an ancient magazine in which mention is made of one De Cugna, a native of Bengal, who is said to have died in 1566, "aged 370 years," having had "four new sets of teeth," frequent changes of hair "from black to grey and from grey to black," and 700 wives (the number of King Solomon's), "some of whom died, the others he put away" (an equivocal term, applied equally to homicide and divorce). This worthy, we are told, was "an idolator for the first hundred years of his life"; then, having arrived at years of discretion and probably cut his wisdom teeth, he became a Mussulman. It is satisfactory to know that the authority to whom the magazine was indebted for its facts (if indeed they be facts) is or was regarded as "a model of veracity."

The eighty-eighth birthday of the German Emperor has caused many anecdotes of his domestic life to be circulated. One of the most recent bears witness to the kindly relations which exist between the venerable Sovereign and Engel, his faithful valet. The latter is seventy years of age and has rather delicate health, after which his master inquires daily with genuine anxiety. One morning this winter, Engel respectfully intimated that he must retire from active service, and rest for the remainder of his days. "Nonsense," replied the Emperor, with a hearty laugh; "neither you nor I, Engel, have time to think of rest." The subject has never since been broached.

Prince George of Wales will soon be afloat again, and preparations for his accommodation are being pushed on rapidly on board the Excellent. The captain's cabin is being refurnished as his sitting-room, and his bed-room will open out of it. Temporary quarters are being prepared for the captain.

One of the most popular French papers is perfectly aghast at some of the monstrosities threatened in the name of fashion, and says that good taste must have vanished from the earth if ladies consent to wear the gold and steel helmets, or the tall edifices of bark adorned with wild flowers and berries, that have appeared in some of the magasins des nouveautés.

Egypt continues to be the most interesting scene of events, so far as we English are concerned, though Afghanistan may give us plenty of anxiety. We are lost in admiration of the gallant manner in which our troops, both British and Indian, do whatever is expected of them in the Egyptian Desert; but we can surely give a moment's attention to the behaviour of those splendid Arabs, whose hopeless bravery is simply heroic, and whose necessary slaughter, by hundreds and thousands, it is impossible to contemplate without a feeling of deep sympathy and without a groan of horror and regret.

The Mahdi appears to have his own little difficulties to contend with in his own more immediate neighbourhood. Another "holy man" seems to have arisen, another Mahdi is said to be in the field. When "holy man" meets "holy man," when Mahdi meets Mahdi, we may expect to see something as desperate as the struggle when Greek meets Greek, whether in war or finance. At any rate, the more Mahdis there are to be set by the ears, the more reason we shall have to thank our stars. There is nothing like dissension in the hostile camp; it is better than many reinforcements. But the rumour is almost too good to be true; or the new Mahdi may be a mere bubble.

Private generosity is doing all it can to ameliorate the condition of our troops in Egypt during the long hot months of comparative inaction, when the recovery of the sick will be retarded by the depressing influences of climate, and the healthy will be prone to fall ill of ennui. Sir Allan Young's yacht Stella left Portsmouth on Friday laden with two hundred cases of such comforts as folding-chairs, cutlery, drugs, chemicals, essence of beef, sausages, rosewater, ice powder and machines, soda-water, games of all kinds, and, though last not least, a large number of boxes of books given by Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son.

There is a great deal of most unwonted stir at Devonport, and the Admiral and principal dockyard officials are very much to be congratulated on their promptness. The Admiralty telegraphed at the latter end of last week to inquire how many vessels in that port were available for active service, and how soon they could be ready for commission. The reply dispatched in an hour or two was that ten ships could be quite ready in a fortnight, the Hotspur being the first. She is a most formidable turret-ship, armour-plated, armed with four formidable guns, and her engines are of 3060-horse power. So many men belonging to the Reserve forces are employed at Devonport, that numbers of labourers have been enrolled in the yard, so that they may be ready to carry on the necessary work if the Reserves are called out.

Thirty years is a long period to look forward to; but the New Hospital for Women, in the Marylebone-road, and the London Hospital both have to wait that length of time for their share in the bequest of the late Dr. Mercer, of Newport, Rhode Island. This gentleman left a certain amount of property to works of religion and benevolence, after some relatives had enjoyed the life interest; and his executrix, Mrs. Anna Pell, wishes two English charities to share in its benefits, and has chosen the above mentioned. Matters are not quite settled; but both these hospitals are eminently deserving, and their needs as well as their efficiency grow annually.

A very valuable volume on the English School of Painting, by the French critic M. Ernest Chesneau, has been published by Messrs. Cassell and Co. It is pleasant to "see ourselves as others see us," when those "others" are as appreciative as M. Chesneau, who really may be said to have discovered some beauties in our art of which we ourselves are but dimly cognisant. The great charm of the book, however, is Professor Ruskin's preface, and the quaint foot-notes, which prove how carefully he considered the book before commending it to the favour of the British public.

The Rothschilds can afford to collect anything they like—diamonds, books, pictures, bibelots—no matter what, so long as it is rare and costly. Baron Alphonse, of Paris, has just given £10,000 for Gainsborough's picture of Mr. and Mrs. Hibbert, at the Grosvenor Gallery, and will take possession of his treasure on the 28th. By-the-way, Baron Alphonse is not quite sure of his seat at the Académie des Beaux-Arts, in Paris, where he expected to be the successor of the late M. Du Sommerard, some slight informality in the proceedings being alleged as the reason. However, the new candidate can afford to wait.

A delightful little story of Madame De Staël has just come to light in the "Memoirs of Madame De Chateaubriand," which has been published during the last two or three weeks at Bordeaux. The Chateaubriands being at Geneva, Madame De Staël called on them and obtained a promise that on their return from Chamounix they would spend a few days with her at Coppet. Some unforeseen obstacle quite prevented them from going, and the literary lady was sadly disappointed, all the more because, having reckoned on the visit, she had forwarded to Paris an account of her conversations with M. De Chateaubriand, in which she had been so fortunate as to convert him to her own political opinions! He, however, took it in very good part, remarking that Madame De Staël had merely written un roman de plus.

When the Princess of Wales gives a garden party it is her custom to invite the guests who have children to bring them also. The result is, that a pretty scene is made still more picturesque by the addition of the gaily-dressed youngsters. Those who were at the last garden party at Marlborough House will remember that Lady Mandeville's sweet twins were the observed of all observers, and that everyone admired the groups of mothers and offspring that lent so much additional beauty to the picture. The example set has very properly and naturally been followed, and Lady Dufferin has taken the fashion with her to Calcutta. At her "at homes" at Government House, now again bright and gay, the usual announcements have been varied by an invitation for matrons to be accompanied by their children, and the innovation has given extreme satisfaction to all who are fortunate enough to be on her Ladyship's list.

Dublin does not now boast so many rich social institutions that they can afford to quarrel or even compete with each other. Yet, in their loyal anxiety to give a fitting entertainment in honour of the visit of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Kildare-street and Sackville-street Clubs were nearly giving offence to a large body of Dublin citizens who desired, in a similar manner, to mark their appreciation of the visit of their Royal guests. Happily, matters have been arranged, and a magnificent ball is to be given, on joint accounts, at the beautiful grounds of the Royal Dublin Society at Ball's Bridge. This is a locality which is not unused to festivities, though of different character to the gaiety now projected, for it is really a part of Donnybrook, where the annual fair, sung of by song-writers and dreaded by the constabulary, used to take place. As all differences have been made up, there is now no danger of a member of the Kildare-street Club challenging a citizen to "tread on the tail of his coat," or of a Sackville-street habitué flourishing a shillalegh over the head of a municipal official; these, according to the melodramatist, being the principal occupations of Irishmen who are enjoying themselves.

Thames anglers have had a narrow escape of being deprived of their beloved relaxation. In the draught of the Thames River Bill there was a clause to the effect that no craft was to be moored within two hundred yards of a riparian property, or within sight of a dwelling house. Had this become law, fishing in the Thames from the unoffending punt would have been put a stop to; and the value of the pleasant river-side inns and cottages must have been depreciated enormously. The danger has, however, been averted; and the disciples of Izaac Walton will be undisturbed in their efforts after the shiny roach and playful barbel. But the question arises, how many regular fishermen who depend on spending all their leisure at Teddington or Marlow were aware of the calamity that threatened them. Very few, indeed, we should think. People who have been accustomed to a certain ordinary pleasure, seem strangely inactive in preserving it. Yet the wails would have been loud and many had the Thames River Bill passed in its entirety.

Modern English dramatists are frequently taunted because they derive so much inspiration from French and German plays. Now the foreigners are retaliating, and translating such works as they think are worthy of that honour. Some months ago the "Silver King" was translated into German, and now Mr. W. S. Gilbert's opera, "Pinafore," is undergoing a process of preparation for the Dutch stage. The circumstance calls to mind a remark of Mr. Burnand given by himself in a sketch of his own works. "Happy Thoughts," said he, "have been very successful, and have even been translated into Dutch. I do not know how they read, but they looked very funny." How strange, indeed, will "the ruler of the Queen's Navee," "Hardly ever," and "Dear little Buttercup," sound in Dutch, is a secret which the Hollanders alone will be able to divulge.

Shaw, the cricketer, is known to be at present in Australia with a team of Englishmen, who are playing matches against the "cornstalks," as the Australians are playfully called. Shaw and his team on the 17th inst. sustained the second of the only two defeats they are believed to have met with in a "representative match" since their arrival. They were beaten at Sydney very unexpectedly, going in for their second innings with a score of 269 against 309; they made no more than 77, and the Australians then went in and made the required 38 for the loss of two wickets.

The death of the Rev. James White, the youngest brother of Henry Kirke White, at the age of ninety-seven, is an event not without interest to the student of literary history. When Mr. White was a youth, his brother Henry, having won "a high poetical reputation," died at the age of twenty-one. Lord Byron deplored his loss in verse; Southey, with a noble disinterestedness, as natural to him as selfishness is to most men, edited the young poet's remains for the benefit of his family. Genius of the highest order was discovered in his poetry, his biography became extremely popular, and a poet of some note declared that the ardent youth, who killed himself by severe study, had won a deathless name. When James White was young, all these and many more indications of Henry's popularity must have been hourly familiar, and the common talk of the family. Nearly eighty years have passed since then, and James White has lived through them to witness the waning reputation of his brother and its final extinction. The pure memory of Kirke White is embalmed in Southey's genial pages; but in counting up the poets of the century no place in the list is found for his name. This is not surprising, for posterity does not judge of a man by what he might have done but by what he has actually done. It should be remembered, however, that nearly all Kirke White's poems were written before he was nineteen, and that if Keats had died at twenty-one he would have left no higher title to fame. To be a distinguished poet at seventeen was a position reserved for Chatterton alone.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

Our Illustrations of the late campaign of Lord Wolseley's army, which has been concluded, resulting in the withdrawal of his head-quarters this week from Korti to Dongola, are nearly at an end. Mr. Melton Prior, our Special Artist, furnishes a Sketch on the returning march across the Desert, with some of the British wounded, including the lamented General Sir Herbert Stewart, carried by native Soudanese soldiers of Gordon's troops, some two hundred of whom, it will be remembered, had come down in the steam-boats from Khartoum, and had joined the British camp at Gubat, a few days before Khartoum surrendered to the Mahdi. Sir Herbert Stewart died of his wounds soon after his arrival at Gakdul; and his grave at that place, with the graves of several others, carefully prepared and adorned by their military comrades, is shown in another of our Artist's Sketches. We publish one more of the Views on the Nile banks sketched by the late Lieutenant-Colonel R. C. Coveny, who commanded the battalion of the 42nd (Black Watch) Royal Highlanders at the battle of Kerbekan, and was there killed in action. It represents that part of the river just above the Gerendil Cataract, nearly opposite Hamdab, where the flotilla of whale-boats conveying General Earle's troops got into smooth water as they ascended the Nile, about the third week in January, and down which they have since passed, with much greater ease, on their return to Merawi and to Korti. We are indebted also to an officer of the 38th (South Staffordshire) Regiment, Lieutenant Poulett Weatherley, who was with the party sent forward to visit the scene of the murder of Colonel J. D. Stewart and Mr. Frank Power, near the Fifth Cataract of the Nile, for a Sketch of the wreck of the Khartoum steamer that conveyed those gentlemen, with M. Herbin, the French Consul, and several Greek traders with their families, so far down the river. It was on Sept. 18, after parting company with the two other steamers which General Gordon had sent down to bombard Berber, that this vessel, the Abdul, struck on a rock at Sulcimanieh, where the wreck of her is still lying, as shown in our correspondent's Sketch, taken on Feb. 20; the whole party got ashore in the boats, and Colonel Stewart, with Mr. Power, M. Herbin, and Hassan Bey, entered a house to confer with the chief of the local tribe, Suleiman Wad Gamr, who seemed willing to lend them assistance for the overland journey to Merawi. The murderous treachery of Wad Gamr had arranged that the house should be presently surrounded by a crowd of men, who rushed in upon the European visitors and slew them, after a brief desperate conflict; the Greeks, of whom there were twelve, including several women, were also killed, and their bodies were thrown into the Nile. Colonel John Donald Stewart, formerly of the 11th Hussars, was the owner of a good estate in the North of Ireland, but had been Vice-Consul in Asia Minor, and latterly employed in the inspection of prisons in Egypt, and in valuable investigations concerning the state of the Soudan. He accompanied General Gordon from London to Khartoum, in January and February last year; and his death has been a great loss to the British Government. Mr. Power was Times correspondent and acting British Consul at Khartoum.

The new military expedition of General Sir Gerald Graham in the neighbourhood of Souakim, where a smaller force under the same commander fought the sanguinary battles of El Teb and Tamai about a twelvemonth ago, has begun active operations during the past week, and its first experiences have been rather severe. On Friday week, as had been anticipated, a portion of the force collected at Souakim marched inland four or five miles towards Hasheen, at the foot of the hills, after a "reconnaissance," or experimental advance movement, the day before. Some four thousand of Osman Digna's followers, armed mostly with spears and swords, made a brief stand on a ridge, from which they were driven by the Berkshire Regiment and the Marine Light Infantry, with the Guards, and part of the Indian Contingent, including the 9th Bengal Lancers, as supports. Expelled from this position, Osman's men retreated southwards towards Tamai, along a route on which, for good reasons, their assailants did not follow them. Others of them made off in a westerly direction, while they were shelled by the artillery. It would seem as if the enemy's object was to draw the British force onwards. Parties of Arabs were working round by the right of the British position, but were scattered by the 5th Lancers. Nine on the British side were killed, including Captain M. D. Dallison, of the Scots Guards, and nearly forty wounded; the enemy lost three or four hundred. The British force then constructed an encampment in three "zerebas," or inclosures of hedges rudely formed of piles of cut mimosa-bushes; these zerebas were arranged on a diagonal line, touching each other at corners, from south-west to north-east; the middle inclosure, which was more than twice as large as the other two, was occupied by the Indian troops, while the Berkshire Regiment was in one of the outer zerebas, and the Marines were in the other. At each end of this encampment was a circular redoubt, of sand-bags, with two Gardner guns in each redoubt, manned by sailors of the Naval Brigade. The ground for some distance around was covered with thick bush. On Sunday afternoon, between two and three o'clock, the soldiers were eating their dinner, when they were surprised by a sudden attack of four thousand Arabs breaking into the middle zereba. Brigadier-General Sir John M'Neill, who was in command, rallied his troops instantly, and there was a fierce fight during twenty minutes, till the enemy were repulsed, but the British loss was considerable, six officers and ninety-six men being killed, a hundred and forty wounded, and seventy missing. Among the officers killed were Lieutenant Seymour, R.N., of H.M.S. Dolphin, Lieutenant Swinton, of the Berkshire Regiment, Captain Romilly and Lieutenant Newman, of the Royal Engineers, and Major Von Beverhoudt, of the Indian Contingent. Six hundred camels and a great number of horses and mules, belonging to the British force, were killed or hamstrung, or otherwise lost, which will make a difficulty of transport. The Arabs, who fought with amazing courage, had more than a thousand killed; some of them were young boys, and the dead bodies of women have been found on the field. On Monday morning, Sir Gerald Graham came out from Souakim with the Scots Guards and Coldstream Guards, having sent the Grenadier Guards before to aid in protecting the encampment. The Indian troops, accompanied by the Grenadier Guards, then returned to Souakim, leaving the position in charge of the Scots and Coldstream Guards, with the Berkshire Regiment, East Surrey Regiment, and Marines. Convoys between Souakim and the camp were twice attacked by the enemy on Tuesday.

The contract for constructing the Irish Citizens' Industrial Exhibition at Dublin was signed last Saturday. The building is to cost £3300, and is to be completed within ten weeks.

Lord Aberdare presided last Saturday afternoon at the distribution of prizes to the successful students of the Dulwich High School, in connection with the Girls' Public Day School Company. The ceremony took place in the hall of the Dulwich College, in the presence of a large number of the students.

MUSIC.

THE BACH CHOIR.

This institution gave a grand celebration of the bicentenary of the birth of the great Leipzig composer on Saturday afternoon (the anniversary of the event), by the performance of his Mass in B minor ("Die Hohe Messe"), at the Royal Albert Hall. This great work is the most important of several of the kind left by Bach. It had lain in comparative oblivion until produced by the Bach Choir in 1876, the year in which this institution was established. Several repetitions were given by the choir, but none on so grand a scale as the performance of last Saturday. The vastness of style and sublimity of the mass render it especially suitable for Saturday's celebration, and for the immense space in which it was then performed. An interesting feature of the occasion was the use of trumpet and oboi d'amore parts as written by the composer. The last-named instruments are now obsolete, and those used on Saturday were manufactured for the Bach Choir's concert of last month. The mass was given with imposing effect by a fine orchestra and chorus, numbering about six hundred performers. The principal solo singers were Miss A. Williams, Madame Patey, and Mr. E. Lloyd; Signor Foli having been, on account of his indisposition, suddenly replaced by Mr. Kempton. As with Handel, so with Bach, his choral writing is that which is most effective, the pieces for solo voices being dwarfed by the immense grandeur of those for the chorus; and this is especially the case in so vast a space as that of the Albert Hall. Each choral division of the mass produced a profound impression, particularly the opening "Kyrie," the "Gloria," the "Cum Sancto," the "Crucifixus," the "Et Resurrexit," the "Confiteor," and the "Sanctus." The elaborate orchestral details were excellently rendered, especially the incidental obbligati accompaniments for violin (Mr. Carrodus), flute (Mr. Svendsen), oboi d'amore (Mr. Horton and Mr. Lebon), and horn (Mr. Mann). Dr. Stainer presided skilfully at the organ, and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt conducted with earnestness and judgment. There was a very large attendance.

At St. James's Hall another Bach celebration was given by Mr. Oscar Beringer, whose concert consisted of performances of four pianoforte concertos by Bach—one for a single instrument, one for two, one for three, and one for four pianofortes. In that for one piano, and in his association in each of the other instances, Mr. Beringer played with artistic skill and style. The pianists who co-operated with him were Mr. Franklin Taylor, Mr. Walter Bache, and Mr. Alfred Richter, all worthy of the occasion. Madame Antoinette Sterling sang two songs of Bach, and Mr. Manns conducted the select string band by which the concertos were accompanied.

Yet another Bach celebration—a partial one—was given at the afternoon Popular Concert of last Saturday, when the second part of the programme consisted of the following pieces of music by the composer referred to—the chromatic fantasia and fugue for pianoforte solo, the prelude and fugue from the sonata in G minor for violin alone, the third of the six sonatas for piano and violin, and two songs, "My heart ever faithful" (with violoncello obbligato by Herr Hausmann), and "Thine heart, oh give me, dearest." The pianist, the violinist, and the vocalist having been, respectively, Mdlle. Kleeberg, Herr Joachim, and Miss C. Elliot, it need scarcely be said that the performances were excellent. In the first part of the programme, which was miscellaneous, Miss C. Myers was the vocalist. Mr. Deacon was the accompanist.

"The Rose of Sharon" was performed at St. James's Hall yesterday (Friday) week, conducted by the composer, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, who came expressly from Italy for the purpose. A specialty of the occasion was the co-operation of Madame Albani, who sang, for the first time, the important music of the title-character with great charm in the love passages, and with dramatic power in those of a more declamatory kind. The other principal solo singers were, as before, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. An excellent band and chorus were engaged, and the performance was altogether a very fine one.

The Saturday Afternoon Crystal Palace Concert of last week possessed an historical interest, the programme having comprised pieces by composers the dates of whose birth range from 1557 to 1813; instrumental and vocal pieces by Gabrieli, Purcell, Rameau, Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Wagner having been given. This week's Saturday Concert is to include the choral symphony and other works of Beethoven.

An excellent musical entertainment was given to the patients of the Brompton Hospital for Diseases of the Chest on Tuesday evening under the direction of Mr. Lindsay Sloper, several vocalists and instrumentalists of note giving their services.

Mr. J. H. Bonawitz's opera, "Irma," was repeated at St. George's Hall on Tuesday evening.

Miss De Warren Fitzhugh (vocalist) gave a morning concert at Prince's Hall on Wednesday.

The London Musical Society gave the first concert of the season during this week. The programme included the first performances in England of Dvorák's "Legenden," Schumann's "Sängers Fluch" (ballad), and Rheinberger's "Christoforus Legend." Our comments must be reserved for next week.

The annual concert by the professional students of the London Academy of Music, under the direction of Professor Wylde, took place yesterday (Friday), at St. James's Hall.

The last concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society's present season was to take place yesterday (Friday) evening with a performance of "Elijah."

The Musical Artists' Society give the thirty-fifth performance of new compositions at Willis's Rooms this evening.

An orchestral and choral concert will be given at the Guildhall this (Saturday) afternoon by the orchestra and Choir of the Guildhall School of Music, directed by Mr. Weist Hill.

Mr. Benham gave his second pianoforte recital at Steinway Hall, and Mr. Isidore De Lara and M. Henri Logé gave their second "Soirée Artistique" at Prince's Hall during this week.

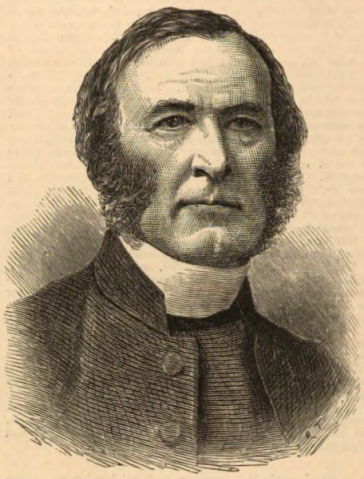
Performances of sacred music are announced for Good Friday at the Royal Albert Hall—where "The Messiah" is to be given—and at the Crystal Palace and at St. James's Hall.

The Edinburgh University Society recently gave the eighteenth annual concert in the Music-Hall. Sir Herbert Oakeley (Edinburgh Professor) conducted. A varied programme of vocal and instrumental music was performed to the satisfaction of a large and appreciative audience.

At the meeting of the Society of Arts on Wednesday Mr. A. J. Ellis read a paper on the "Musical Scales of Various Nations," illustrated by playing the scales, and occasionally strains, on properly tuned instruments, forming a continuation of the paper on the "History of Musical Pitch," read by Mr. Ellis before the society in 1880.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

When it was announced that Mr. Pinero had written a farcical comedy, or a farce, or at any rate an extravagance, and that it was to be produced at the Court Theatre, it was considered necessary to issue an apologetic placard. It was assumed that there would be much virtuous indignation thereat, and that the newspapers would teem with protests at the desecration of a theatre supposed to be devoted to comedy. We were told that the children of the House of Molière in the Rue de Richelieu, Paris, occasionally made merry in a very extravagant fashion, and that really there was no harm in making merry even in Sloane-square. The full force of this semi-official apology was never very apparent. Modern comedy is so extremely like farce that it would be a difficult matter to distinguish between them; and why the house that had produced the "Parvenu" and "A Milliner's Bill" should have been so nervous at announcing "The Magistrate" is not altogether clear. All that the public wants is a good entertainment, of whatever kind it may be—tragedy, comedy, farce, or burlesque. Those who like literary plays very naturally ask permission to enjoy them without having their attention distracted by the cackling of small wits and buffoons; those who like farces—and who does not?—would resent the insult of cheap sneers from the affected and the cultured. Mr. Burnand labours under the impression that there is a "dead set" made at him because he uses music-hall songs in his burlesques. Not a bit of it. Burlesques would be dull things, indeed, without the adventitious aid of the music-hall. All that the ordinary common-sense person requires is a song, and not a scream. The music-hall répertoire is surely not so exhausted that its minstrelsy is best represented by a vulgar shout, as distracting to the nerves as the yell of the newspaper boys with their special editions, or the bawling of a periwinkle man at tea-time on a quiet Sunday afternoon. There is enough noise in London without its transference to the stage in the guise of a music-hall song.



As it turns out, "The Magistrate" is a very excellent farce indeed; even a funnier play than Mr. Pinero's "Rocket," and that surely is very high praise. It is founded on a thoroughly humorous idea; it contains what all popular plays should contain—not one good part or two good parts, but opportunities for smart character-acting throughout the cast; and, best of all, it is written with a dry humour and quaintness of expression very seldom found in the best plays of the kind. The rare cleverness of Mr. Pinero consists in utilising the very scenes so popular at the lower French theatres and never once tasting the forbidden fruit. A West-End supper-room on the stage, without so much as the rustle of a gown, the fall of a veil, or the sight of a domino that could raise a blush on the fair face of Mr. Gilbert's "young lady of fifteen," is in itself a very remarkable achievement. Whether that young lady might not raise awkward questions regarding the Eton lad; who is in reality far older than he is represented to be, and is consequently overwhelmed with the gratuitous attentions of the little governess and the pretty housemaid, is a point that need not further be discussed. This is a side issue, and does not conflict with the rare comicality of the austere police magistrate, who is tempted from his allegiance to veracity and propriety by a strip of a lad; who is made the victim of an awkward dilemma bringing him in contact with the police, and, having run the gauntlet of the whole of the "A" Division, finds himself presiding in his own court, sitting in judgment on his personal friends, and condemning his own wife and sister-in-law to a short period of imprisonment without the option of a fine. Mr. Posket is simply one of the best comic characters that has been introduced into farce since the days of Buckstone, Compton, and Charles Mathews. It has tragic possibilities in it that would have delighted Robson. With what a cold sweat of agitation, with what a sense of nervous exhaustion, would not the Robson of the Olympic days have described the flight of the police magistrate from Leicester-square to Kilburn! This is in the highest vein of elevated comic writing. Who could not have played Mr. Posket? Toole, Terry, David James might well have given their heads and ears for such a character. But there is one actor that I should have liked to see play it, though I doubt not I shall be laughed at for saying so. I should like to have seen Irving's idea of this terror-haunted magistrate. For of course there are two Irvings. I mean the Irving of Jingle, and Digby Grant, and Chenevix renown. Irving, the comedian, in its broadest sense. Do not let it be implied from this that Mr. Arthur Cecil does not play the part extremely well. He does. The play owes a great deal to his skill, intensity, and cleverness. But it is a part with grand opportunities in it. It requires as much power as finish, as much intensity as detail. Mr. John Clayton is as good as can be as an Indian Colonel bursting with chivalrous sentiment, but perpetually doomed to do the shabby thing. His anxiety when he is compelled to send the friend who is supping with him to shiver on a wet balcony whilst he entertains two ladies who have forced themselves upon him, is excellently rendered, and is only equalled by his dilemma when he wants to tell the police magistrate that he is going to try his own wife, but is forced to be silent owing to the punctiliousness of his magisterial friend. These two characters alone are able to make the fortune of any farce. But when we add to them Mrs. John Wood as a widow with a secret; Miss Marion Terry as a hungry sister doomed to conceal her appetite out of regard for her relations who seek her, and which she plays with a delightful sense of humour; Mr. F. Kerr, who gives an unexaggerated and truthful picture of a modern young swell afflicted with sentiment; and Mr. Eversfield, as the irrepressible Eton boy, enough has been said to show that Mr. Pinero, actor like, provides the company all round with excellent parts. Nearly every one of the minor characters is well played. What could be more clever and natural than the sketches from the life of the police inspector, the police-court chief clerk, the restaurant keeper, the waiter, and the Irish sergeant of police?

Two things are not quite so clear to the critical mind. Why should the second police magistrate be permitted to force that not very laughable jest about taking jujubes, and over-elaborate the business connected with it? And why should Mr. Posket's butler indulge in such horrible grimaces? When the jujubes have been boldly and bodily cut out, and when the chief butler ceases to make so much capital out of a grin, there will be really no fault whatever to find with "The Magistrate." It is quite clear that the public likes this class of entertainment, or it would not be so liberally patronised. In this instance, Mr. Pinero has given us farce of the best possible kind, and it deserves to succeed. C. S.

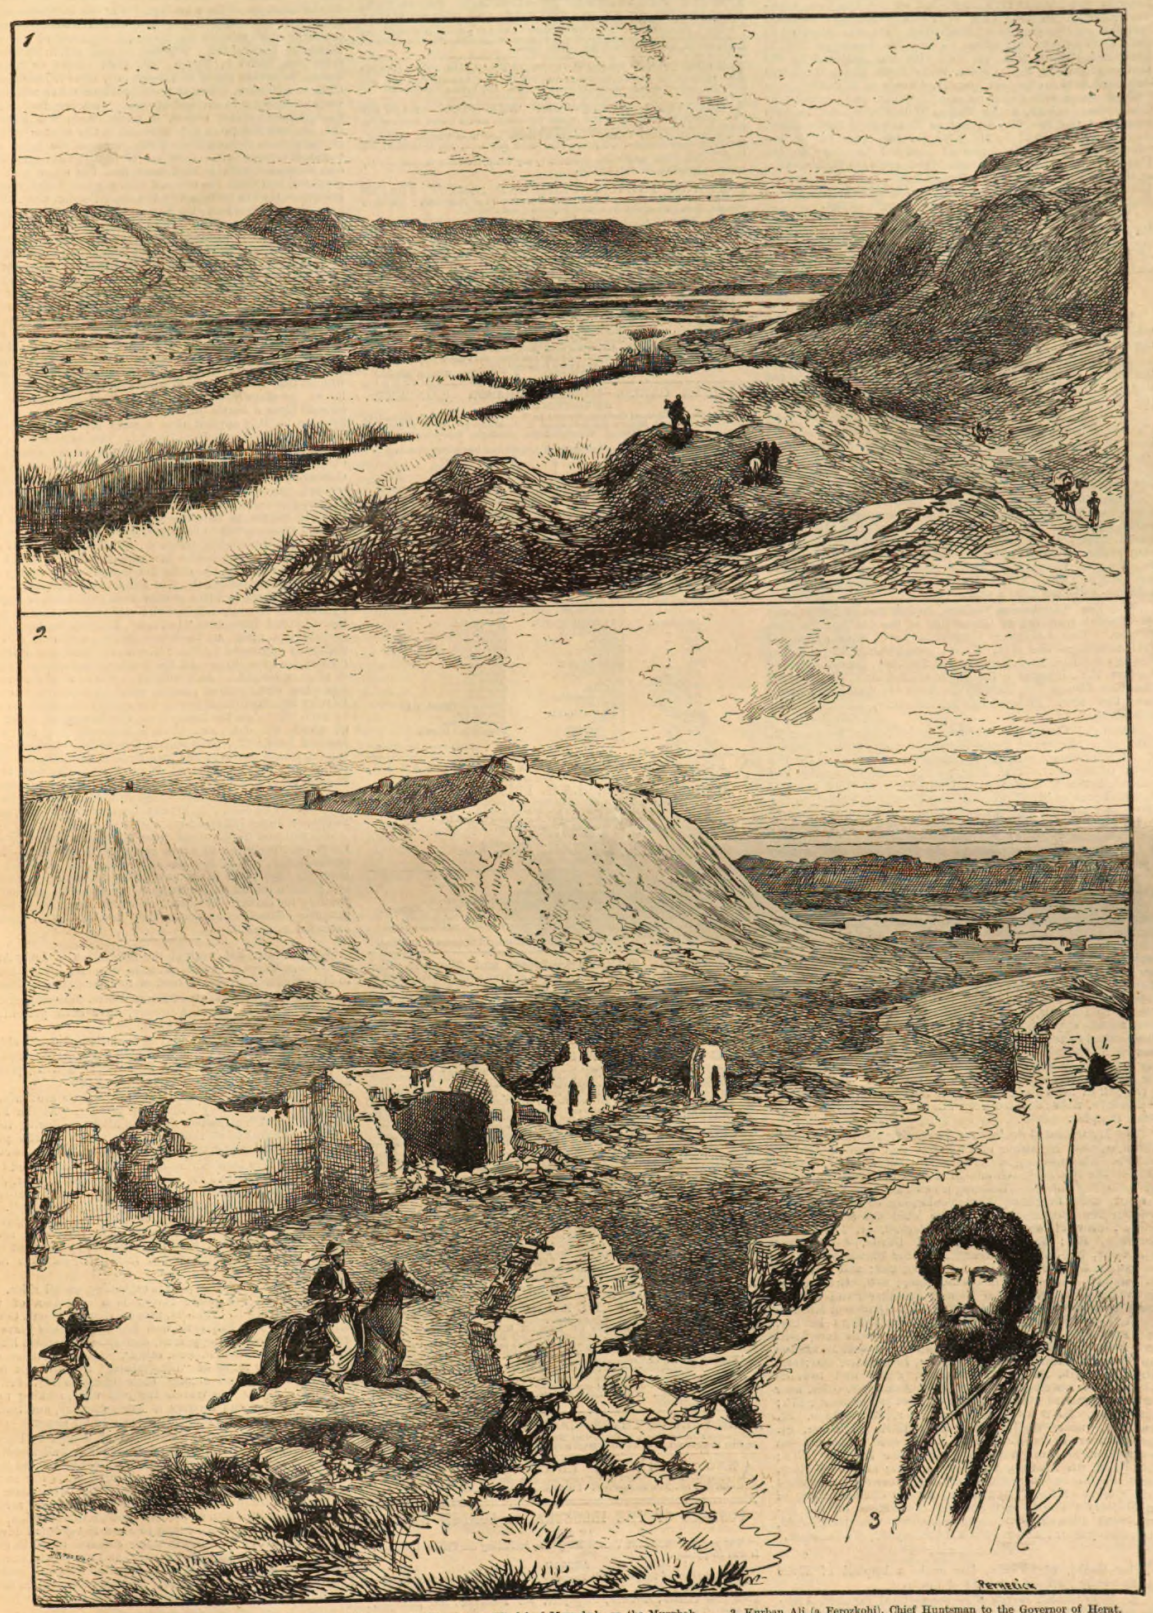
Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's exhilarating entertainment at St. George's Hall will reopen on Easter Monday at three and eight. At the afternoon performance a new piece will be produced entitled "Hobbies," written by H. P. Stephens and W. Yardley; the music by George Gear. Mr. Corney Grain, the most amusing of entertainers, will also provide a new Musical Sketch, entitled "A Vocal Recital."

THE RIGHT REV. E. H. BICKERSTETH, BISHOP OF EXETER.

THE RIGHT REV. F. TEMPLE, D.D., BISHOP OF LONDON.

THE RIGHT REV. E. KING, D.D., BISHOP OF LINCOLN.

THREE NEW BISHOPS.



The Right Rev. Frederick Temple, D.D., the new Bishop of London, is son of the late Major Temple, sometime Governor of Sierra Leone. He was born on Nov. 30, 1821, and was educated at Blundell's School, Tiverton, and at Balliol College, Oxford, taking double first-class honours in 1842. Having been ordained by Dr. Wilberforce, Bishop of Oxford, he held the Principalship of the Government Training College at Kneller Hall, Twickenham, from 1848 to 1855; from the latter date to 1858 he was employed as one of the Inspectors of Schools. In 1858 he was elected Head Master of Rugby School. This post he held for eleven years with remarkable success. He was for some years a select preacher at Oxford, and one of the chaplains in ordinary to the Queen. He was consecrated successor of Bishop Phillpotts in the see of Exeter in 1869. He was Bampton Lecturer at Oxford last year. Dr. Temple married, in 1876, Miss Beatrice Blanche Lascelles, daughter of the late Right Hon. William Lascelles, M.P., and cousin of the Earl of Harewood. The ceremony of the confirmation of Bishop Temple was performed last Tuesday, with the prescribed forms, at Bow Church in Cheapside.

The Right Rev. Edward Henry Bickersteth, who succeeds Bishop Temple at Exeter, is the only son of the late Rev. Edward Bickersteth, of Watton, Herts, and was born in London in 1825. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he won the Chancellor's medal for English verse each year of his residence. In 1848 Mr. Bickersteth was ordained by the late Bishop Stanley, of Norwich. Having held two country cures, in Norfolk and Dorsetshire, Mr. Bickersteth thirty years ago was appointed Vicar of Christ Church, Hampstead. He is author of "Yesterday, To-day, and for Ever," and other religious poems, while his "Hymnal Companion" is used in many English churches. Among his other works are a commentary on the New Testament and several treatises on the special offices of the Prayer-Book. He is a member of the committees of the Church Missionary Society and of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. His appointment to the Deanery of Gloucester preceded by a few weeks his elevation to the Episcopal Bench.

The Right Rev. Edward King, D.D., the new Bishop of Lincoln, was born in 1829, and is son of the late Ven. Archdeacon King, in that part of Essex which was formerly included in the diocese of Rochester. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. in 1851, and that of M.A. in 1855. He was ordained by the Bishop of Oxford, the late Dr. Wilberforce, about the latter date, and held during four years the Curacy of Wheatley, near Oxford, after which he became Chaplain and Lecturer at Cuddesdon College, under Bishop Wilberforce, and in 1863 succeeded the Rev. Mr. Swiney as Principal of that college. This office was held by Mr. King for ten years, till he was nominated Regius Professor of Pastoral Theology in the University of Oxford, and obtained the degree of D.D., becoming at the same time a Canon of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford. His instructions and example in this professorship have gained him the esteem of a large part of the younger clergy.

The Portrait of Bishop Temple is from a photograph by Mr. A. Browning, Exeter; that of Bishop Bickersteth, from one by Messrs. Boning and Small, of Baker-street; and that of Bishop King, from one by Messrs. Hills and Saunders, of Oxford.

THE CHURCH.

The crypt of the Church of St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside, was crowded on Tuesday on the confirmation of Dr. Temple to the office of Bishop of London.

At Lincoln yesterday week the Greater Chapter met in the Cathedral, when the Rev. Canon King was formally elected Bishop of the diocese.—Dr. Wordsworth, who recently resigned the see, died at Harewood, near Leeds, last Saturday night.

By permission of the Rev. H. G. Sprigg, Vicar of Christ Church, Battersea, the ground attached to that church has been thrown open to the public by the Metropolitan Public Garden, &c., Association, who have laid this ground out as a garden, supplied the necessary seats, appointed a caretaker, and bear the cost of its maintenance.

Miss Chaffin Grove, who a few years since presented an organ to Salisbury Cathedral, has made a beneficent gift to the parish church at Wincanton. The living of that church was worth £200. After the offertory at a recent service at the church she presented at the communion-table the great tithes attaching to the parish, which represent a total value of not less than £10,000. This will raise the value of the living to between £600 and £700 a year.

The Ven. Archdeacon Sanders, Archdeacon of Exeter, was on Monday installed as Chancellor of the Cathedral in that diocese. The following clergymen have been appointed Prebendaries:—The Rev. E. N. Dumbleton, St. James's, Exeter; the Rev. E. G. Sandford, of Laudkey, Barnstaple; and the Rev. F. C. Hingeston-Randolph, of Ringmore, Kingsbridge. The Rev. Canon Lee, Exeter, has been appointed Treasurer; and the Rev. Prebendary Bartholomew, of Cornwood; Sub-Dean.

The Lord Chancellor has presented the Rev. Seymour R. Coxe, M.A., Rector of Bacoustborpe, Norfolk, to the Vicarage of Stamfordham, near Newcastle-on-Tyne, vacant by the death of the Rev. J. F. Bigge.—The Lord Chancellor has presented the Rev. Henry A. Hall, Vicar of Holy Trinity, parish church of St. Philip and Jacob Without, Bristol, to the living of Swindon, Wilts, void by the preferment of the Rev. G. H. Baily to the Rectory of Lydiard Tregoz.—By the death, in his eightieth year, of the Rev. Thomas Drosier, the living of Colebrook, near Copplestone, Devon, of the value of £300 a year, falls to the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter.

The picturesque old Church of St. James, Whitfield, Glossop, has, through the thoughtful generosity of Miss Wood, a resident, been furnished with a new clock of very superior construction, manufactured by the eminent firm of J. W. Benson, at their steam factory for turret clocks on Ludgate-hill. The clock has four dials, and strikes the quarter Cambridge chimes. The pendulum is compensated to counteract the variations of temperature.—A beautiful window (by Mayer, of Munich) has been put up in St. George's Cathedral, Capetown, to the memory of the late Right Rev. Henry Alexander Douglas, Bishop of Bombay, who for some years prior to his appointment to that see was Dean of Capetown. The central figures are Our Blessed Lord, with hand extended over St. Peter, who is kneeling at His feet to receive His blessing preparatory to going forth to teach all nations, whilst in the background are three of the other disciples. This window is the gift of Miss Mary Arthur, the foundress of St. George's Orphanage, whose devoted work was so highly appreciated by Dean Douglas.

The Incorporated Society for Promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels held its usual monthly meeting at the Society's house, No. 7, Whitehall, on the 9th inst. Grants of money were made in aid of the following objects:—Building a new church at Preston, St. Saviour, near Brighton, £120; enlarging or otherwise improving the accommodation in the churches at Brill, All Saints', near Thame, Bucks, £40; Bexhill, St. Mark, near Hastings, £50; Exborne, St. Mary, Devon, £30; Great Wollaston, St. John the Evangelist, near Shrewsbury, £15; Tangmere, St. Andrew, near Chichester, £20; and Wentnor, St. Michael, near Bishop's Castle, Salop, £30. Grants were also made from the Special Mission Building Fund towards building mission churches at Dudley, in the parish of Killingworth, near Newcastle-on-Tyne, £25; and High Felling, Durham, £30. The following grants for works completed were also paid:—Towards building new churches at Middleton Junction, St. Gabriel, near Chadderton, Lancashire, £50; and South Lambeth, All Saints', Surrey, £220; and towards enlarging or restoring the churches at Aston, St. Giles, near Ludlow, Hereford, £15; Chard, Somerset (on account), £75; Frindsbury, All Saints', near Rochester, £50; Hope, St. Cynfarch, near Mold, Flint, £15; Little Waltham, St. Martin, near Chelmsford, £10; Nottingham, Emanuel (on account), £200; Staverton, St. Mary, near Daventry, £15; Upholland, St. Thomas, near Wigan, £60; and West Ham, Essex, mission building, £20.—In consequence of the intended pulling down of No. 7, Whitehall, by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods and Forests, the offices of the Incorporated Church Building Society will be transferred, immediately after Easter, to No. 2, Dean's-yard, Westminster.

Miss Heald, of Lincoln, has made a bequest of £5000 pounds to the Yorkshire College at Leeds.

The Irish Church Bench of Bishops—Lord Plunket, Archbishop of Dublin, presiding—met last Saturday to decide on the election for the Bishopric of Meath. Neither Dr. Bell nor Dean Reichel having the requisite two-thirds majority of clergy and laity, an objection to the validity of the return was raised; and action was deferred, in order that the Synod Court might deal with the controverted legal question.

FINE ARTS.

THE BURLINGTON FINE ARTS CLUB.

Probably on no previous occasion has so magnificent a collection of works illustrative of Persian and Arab art been got together as may now be seen at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, by the courtesy of its members. For the first time also some attempt at systematic arrangement has been made, as well as a practical effort to solve the historical sequence of the various phases of Oriental art. Whether ceramic art, in its decorative form, originated in Egypt, and then passed eastward into Persia, to return again to Europe only after it had undergone Chinese influence, is one of those problems which will probably vex antiquarians to the end of time. Judging, however, from the specimens under notice, it would seem not improbable that the two Egyptian vessels found in the mortuary chamber of the palaces beyond Thebes are amongst the most ancient works of ceramic art. Both are of a turquoise-blue colour; one decorated with lotus-flowers, and the other with hieroglyphics, and both are covered with a glaze which very much resembles that to be found on the older Persian ware. Experts even do not venture to lay down any very definite rule as to the characteristics of the various stages through which Eastern art passed; and, looking round the room at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, it seems almost hopeless to establish any chronological sequence based upon the shapes preferred, the colours introduced, or the designs in vogue. Possibly, something more tangible may be obtained with a wider knowledge of the glaze, which varies apparently more consistently with the date presumed than with the country assigned. In all probability, a simple sand-glaze was the earliest method of polish; but the use of copper in obtaining the blue colouring possibly opened the door to its use as a metallic surface-producing agent. The vitreous glaze, however, with which the really soft Persian paste was covered must be of great antiquity, and its method of application can be seen from a bottle (in Cabinet No. 1), where the glaze has been so lavishly applied that a solid semi-transparent drop like a stalactite hangs from the jug. The influence of China—which is first traceable in the suggestion of the dragon in the design and of green in the colouring—brought about a great change, and ushered in a far more delicate and transparent enamel, foreshadowing the future celadon. But a little later the tin-glaze—which we find not only in Persian lustre, but in what is known as Hispano-Moresque pottery and the Italian Gubbio ware—seems to have predominated. This theory may probably be thoroughly unsound; but it suggests itself almost naturally in passing before the various cabinets which mark the development of the early Persian pottery, possibly in the twelfth century, under the first influence of China. In design and colour there is little change that might not be explained by a more lively appreciation of Nature; but when we come to the so-called Damascus "faience" (Cabinet 8), we find that realism has made an immense stride, which is still more delicately expressed by the "Rhodian" artists, and the connection between these and the modern European "potters" is at once sensible. In a collection where nearly every piece has some historical or artistic value, it is scarcely necessary to refer to individual objects; but special interest must attach to such pieces as the Lamp from the Mosque of Omar (527), of which the date, A.D. 1549, is indisputable; the Persian Lustred Bottle (22), with female figures in relief, assigned to the thirteenth century; the two Persian Rice-Dishes (98 and 102); the Persian Lustred Wall Tiles (132 and 149); a Persian Ivory Casket (176), assigned to the fourteenth century; the collection of Anatolian Ware in Cabinet 7, the Rhodian Plates (434 and 442), the Persian Lustred Basin (491), and the Damascus Jugs (522 and 546).

In addition to the vases, jugs, and tiles referred to above, there are specimens of brass and other metal-work, carpets, embroideries, and a few pieces of glass—all of which go to show the high place in art-production attained by more than one Eastern nation so far back as the fifteenth century, and possibly far earlier—by countries which now can at best reproduce coarsely what once they invented with taste and executed with skill.

In our notice last week of the Exhibition of Lady Artists, the Breton Views, to which allusion was made, were ascribed to Miss Melicent Grose, instead of to Miss Melicent Grosc.

Count Gleichen's busts of Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft, exhibited last season at the Royal Academy, have been presented by Mr. Bancroft to the Garrick Club.

Yesterday week the annual distribution of prizes obtained by the students of the St. Martin's School of Art took place in Castle-street, Long-acre. Mr. Phil Morris, A.R.A., presided, giving the pupils some sound practical advice.

The Corporation of Nottingham has, we are informed, acquired Mr. W. S. Jay's charming picture, "At the Fall of the Leaf," which attracted so much attention during the last season's exhibition at the Grosvenor Gallery. The picture will be added to the permanent collection of the art museum.

The fifth free loan exhibition of pictures, organised by the Rev. S. A. Barnett and his friends, is to be held in St. Jude's Schools, Commercial-street, Whitechapel, to-day (Saturday), and will remain open until April 13 (Sundays included). The four preceding exhibitions, held at the corresponding periods of the years 1881-4, were attended with increasing success, and abundantly proved that the pictures by the best artists meet with earnest appreciation from the dwellers in the East-end.

The picture exhibition area is extending on all sides. The latest applicant for public favour is a collection of water colours by Mr. R. E. Pritchett, now on view at Messrs. Coomes, 331, Strand. Mr. Pritchett won his spurs many years ago, when Once a Week first appeared, and attracted artists like Mr. F. Walker, Mr. Pinwell, and others. Although these stood foremost in the ranks of "illustrators," they did not fail to influence others, and among their disciples Mr. Pritchett occupies a place. He travels far and wide, picking up impressions of men and scenery in every country, and transfers them with facility and often with grace to his paper.

A large and interesting Exhibition of Works by Deceased Water-Colour Painters, gleaned from many well-known and important collections, is open at the gallery of the old society for a brief period, as next Monday, March 30, is the last day on which these works will be visible. The drawing-date from the time of Claude; and, although a chronological arrangement is beyond the aim of the Art Club on this occasion, there is quite enough of classification to show the gradual development of the art of painting in water colours, in works chiefly by the members of the senior society, and notably in examples by Cristall, Hunt, De Wint, Cattermole, Robson, Harding, Prout, Lewis, and many others. The proceeds will be handed to the Artists' General Benevolent Institution.

The committee of the Royal Humane Society has awarded medals for gallantry in saving life to Sergeant T. Hauraham and Colour-Sergeant J. Moylan, 1st Battalion Royal Irish Regiment, for saving Lieutenant-Colonel Hugh Shaw, V.C., in the Nile, near Debbeh.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY DISPUTE.

We present further Sketches of the disputed frontier between Afghanistan, north of Herat, and the newly conquered Russian dominions in Turkestan. Mr. William Simpson, our Special Artist with the British Afghan Boundary Commission, has accompanied General Sir Peter Lumsden's Staff in all their movements to and fro in the Badghis territory, between the Heri-Rud and the Murghab, since their arrival at Sarakhs on Nov. 7, travelling first up the Heri-Rud valley, by Pul-i-Khatun and Goolar, opposite the Zulfagar Pass, thence to Kuhsan, where they met Colonel Ridgeway's part of the expedition, from India, and proceeding afterwards by Tomaun-Agha and the Chesmeh-Subz Pass to the Kushk valley, which they descended to Pul-i-Khisti and Ak Tapa, thence visiting Penjdeh, and going up the Murghab, crossing that river at Maruchak, to arrive on Dec. 14 at Bala Murghab, the winter quarters of the Expedition. Since Jan. 30, the date of our last letters received from Mr. Simpson, the alarming advance of the Russian outposts to Ak Robat and Pul-i-Khisti, and their threatening attitude near Penjdeh, have obliged Sir Peter Lumsden to quit Bala Murghab and to occupy a position much nearer Herat, at Gurlin, south of Ak Robat, in order to guard the direct roads of approach from Badghis to the capital of Western Afghanistan.

A View of the ruins of the old town of Maruchak was included among the numerous Sketches published in this Journal on the 14th inst., which contained Mr. Simpson's narrative of his journey from Kuhsan to Penjdeh, and from Penjdeh to Bala Murghab. The "Arg" or Citadel (in Latin it would be "Arx"), which formerly commanded or protected this town, is the subject of one of the present Illustrations. "The upper part," Mr. Simpson writes, "is a mound or Tapa, with remains of brick walls and towers round it, which are now being repaired; there were men at work on our visit. From this, on the north-east, extends a great ramp, nearly as high as the Tapa; probably it is the remainder of an early wall of the place. Two ruined towers yet stand on it, but it has lately been repaired, till it looks exactly like a railway embankment. Within it, and under the north-east corner of the Tapa, is a great hollow, which has the appearance of being intended for the purpose of keeping a supply of water. On the east side, within this circular wall or ridge, are a number of houses for soldiers, built of sun-dried brick. The outer wall is evidently more modern, and is slight in its construction, compared with the inner circular one. The outer wall is now very much in ruins; its western face is in the best condition. This outer wall may have been made on account of an increase of population, or to protect the cattle when raids took place. Captain De Lassoe tells me that the citadels of Maruchak and Herat are similar in plan and design; according to popular belief, Maruchak was copied from Herat. The inner enceinte is 380 paces all round; Sir Peter Lumsden got a man to walk round and count his paces, but the man is thought to have made a mistake in his reckoning; the western face, on the top of the Tapa, is twice thirty-five paces. This inner enceinte is being strengthened, and the outer wall is to be removed, while guns are to be placed on the north-west and south-east corners of the Tapa."

The river Murghab, like the river Heri-Rud at Kizil-Koi above Sarakhs, has been turned to irrigation uses by constructing a "bund" or dam, forcing the water into several shallow streams which formerly enabled the land to be richly cultivated, as is still done in the vicinity of Herat. The Bund-i-Nadri, an old work of this kind, is half way between Penjdeh and Maruchak; but the river has forsaken its ancient bed at this place, and now flows on the other side of the valley, so that a new "bund" has been made higher up. The stream flowing near the road, shown in the foreground of our Artist's Sketch, is the Bund-i-Nadri canal, of beautiful clear water, which is said to have been carried, at one time, westward by an aqueduct across the Kushk valley, and over the river Kushk at Pul-i-Khisti.

The man whose Portrait is sketched on the same page is Kurban Ali, a native of the Ferozkoh mountain country in Khorassan, or one of a family belonging to that district, many of whom are settled at Herat. He holds the office of chief huntsman in the establishment of the Afghan Governor of Herat, the Naib Ulhukmut, Mohammed Sarwar Khan, who met Sir Peter Lumsden at Kuhsan, and whose Portrait we have already given. Kurban Ali is dressed in a yellow "poshteen," or sheep-skin mantle, and carries slung at his back a long rifle with two slightly curved sticks, resembling prongs or horns, pointed at the ends, attached to the barrel of the rifle, upon which they can move up or down by a hinge; but when the rifle is borne on the shoulder, as we see in this instance, the sticks are tied up to the end of the barrel. This pair of sticks is for a rest to be used in shooting, as the custom of Afghan sportsmen is never to shoot their game running or flying, but to approach it quietly by "stalking," or creeping behind any cover as near as possible; the man then squats or sits down, fixes the rest of his gun on the ground before him, and takes a slow and steady aim at the beast or bird that he means to kill. The Afghans were much astonished to see the Englishmen of Sir Peter Lumsden's party shooting pheasants on the wing. "Kurban Ali was," says Mr. Simpson, "in charge of a hunting expedition, to which Sir Peter Lumsden, and some of the officers of the camp, went the other day. This was in the Tirbund-i-Turkestan Mountains, to the south-east of Bala Murghab. The ibex and oorial or mouffion, the wild sheep, were among the spoils. The oorial is called mull here, and is found nowhere in Europe except in Sardinia; its horns resemble but are smaller than those of the Ovis Ammon of the Himalayas. The ibex of this locality has much smaller horns than the ibex of the Himalayas; here it is called tukkeh, the same as Tekké, the name of the tribe of Turkomans. Wild boar were also seen, but only one was brought in."

We have already described the felt tents of the Turkomans, called by the Russians "kibitkas." At Penjdeh, where the Sarik Turkomans form a large community, our Artist saw a highly ornamental residence of that kind. The roof of the kibitka in this case, it will be seen, is a dome; in this particular the form varies in the different localities. The sides are here ornamented on the outside with drapery, as well as coloured fringes and tassels. These are very tastefully arranged around the door, the door itself being formed by a beautiful carpet. "I managed," he says, "to get sketches at Penjdeh of some of the women and children, which I have introduced, and have made into the subject of 'Departing on a Raid.' The Khan, or chief, has his horse ready to mount; one arm caresses the horse on which his life may depend during the raid, while the other fondly embraces his wife. She, in the anxiety of the moment, turns to her child, who, with whip in hand, evidently wishes to ride his father's horse. At a kibitka behind, another Turkoman is bidding good-bye to some one dear to him. The dog looks as if even he knew what was going on, and is ready to start. The woman's dress is peculiar; she wears a high hat, in shape like a Papal tiara, and her person is covered with large silver ornaments. The one on her breast is for holding charms."

PILGRIMS ON THE ROAD TO MESHED.

Mr. Simpson writes as follows upon this subject:—

"The road from Teheran to Shahrud and Nishapore, along which the Afghan Frontier Commission passed in October, leads to Meshed, or 'Meshed the Holy,' a reputation that city derives from the celebrated shrine it possesses of the Imám Reza, the eighth Imám from Ali. It is, of course, a Shia shrine, and its character for sanctity only appeals to that sect of Mohammedans. The Persians are Shias, and are constantly using words in praise of Ali, while terms of an opposite tendency are frequently on their tongues against Omar. The Shias believe that Mohammed, before his death, appointed Ali to succeed him in the Caliphate. On the death of the Prophet, Abubekr became Caliph, then Osman, and after him Omar. This is the cause of the hatred. Ali did become Kaliph after Omar; and as it was the case that he really enjoyed the dignity, it is not quite so easy to see why the hatred should be so great. Yet such is the case. Billings-gate could scarcely equal the strength and coarseness of the language constantly used in reference to Omar. When Shias and Sunnis meet, it is this language which leads to quarrels and even to fighting. There have been, according to the Shias, twelve Imáms; of course they reject Abubekr Osman, and the hated Omar, and begin with Ali as the first. The following is the list, according to Shia authorities:—1. Ali; 2. Hassan; 3. Hosein; 4. Zeinal Abedin; 5. Mohammad Bauker; 6. Safar; 7. Musa; 8. Reza; 9. Mohammad Taki; 10. Ali-un-Naki; 11. Hassan Askari; 12. the Mahdi. The twelfth Imám, whom the Shias believe to be the real Mahdi, did not die, but only disappeared, and is somewhere waiting till the proper time arrives to reappear, and to guide the faithful through the dreadful events which are to precede the Day of Judgment. The Imám Reza is, it will be seen, the eighth on the list, and his shrine at Meshed is therichest and perhaps the most celebrated spot in Persia. This is the season of the pilgrims going to Meshed, and we pass large numbers of them on the road; the caravanserais are filled with them and their animals, for many are mounted on horses, mules, and donkeys. The women all travel in litters peculiar to the country; the commonest kind are called "mahmels"; and the same name is given to the litter in which the Holy Carpet is carried to Mecca. Here the mahmel is merely a kind of square box, open at the top, just large enough for a woman to sit, in a very cramped position. A mule carries two of these, and almost always with a lady in each. The other kind of litter is larger and superior in every way, for it has a covering of cloth which goes all round and over the top. The front only is left open; but there is a curtain which can be closed if any one ventures on what is considered ill-breeding here—that is, to look at a lady. This litter is called a 'Kajawa.' As pilgrims to Mecca are called Kajis, so those who visit the Shrine of the Imám Reza are called 'Meshedees.' This shrine has very large revenues derived from land in various parts of the country. Lasgird, the curious fortified village we passed on our way from Teheran, belongs to Meshed, and pays 1000 tomans a year, besides a payment of grain."

Rear-Admiral the Hon. W. J. Ward was on Monday appointed Admiral Superintendent of Malta Dockyard.

Musurus Pasha, the Ottoman Ambassador, presided, on the 19th inst., at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress, and made an appeal for aid to its funds, which resulted in contributions amounting to over £3000.

The Queen has entered seven animals for competition at the forthcoming Cattle Show of the Royal Dublin Society, which is to be visited by the Prince and Princess of Wales the day they arrive in Dublin. The animals will go from Windsor, and belong to the Hereford Shorthorn and Devon Classes. Her Majesty will also exhibit in the Swine Department.

A musical festival in aid of the funds required for the support of the Homes for Little Boys at Farningham and Swanley was held yesterday week at the Albert Hall, which was attended by the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Whitehead, and Mr. Sheriff Phillips, in state. There were from 7000 to 8000 persons present. The instrumentalists were the boys' military band, and the vocalists were Mr. Joseph Proudman's choir and about 400 of the boys belonging to the homes—the united bodies comprising more than 1000 voices. The school prizes were distributed to the boys by the Lady Mayoress, and the Lord Mayor expressed the pleasure he had at being present, his sense of the high value of the homes, and his approval of the suggestion of Mr. Price Hughes. A collection was then made, yielding £166, which brought up the total amount received at the celebration of this anniversary to £2063.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. W. I. PALMER, OF READING.

On Thursday week, a meeting was held in the New Townhall, Reading, to present a public testimonial to Mr. William Isaac Palmer, of the firm of Huntley and Palmers, biscuit manufacturers. This gentleman has for many years been one of the foremost in helping on all works of a public character in Reading, one of which was the erection of the New Townhall, with its annexed buildings, consisting of a Free Library, Reading-Rooms, Museum, and Schools of Science and Art. The testimonial to Mr. Palmer was originated by the Mayor of Reading, Mr. Arthur Hill, and more than three thousand persons have subscribed. The meeting was crowded, and the Mayor and Corporation, with the Town Clerk, in their robes of office, were present. The testimonial consists of a portrait of Mr. Palmer, by Mr. Frank Holl, R.A., with an address, in album form, bearing the names of all the subscribers, beautifully engrossed and illuminated by Mr. W. H. Pountney, of Reading; and with a handsome piece of plate, designed and manufactured by Messrs. Bracher and Sydenham, of Reading, silversmiths. We give an Illustration of this work of art. It is wrought of solid silver, the style being semi-Gothic, and stands twenty inches in height. It has an oblong base enriched with Gothic ornaments, supporting in its centre, between two seated figures, beautifully modelled, a square pedestal serving as a frame to a view of the Reading New Townhall and Municipal Buildings, in bas-relief. On the reverse side is a corresponding frame bearing an inscription. The figures seated right and left of the pedestal are symbolical of Charity and Education; in front are represented the terrestrial globe, a Greek vase, artist's pallet, sculptor's mallets, books, and other articles. On the other side of the base, the plough, reaping-hook, and other agricultural implements, are represented; and surmounting the pedestal are three chaste and beautifully executed figures emblematic of the arts of painting, metal-work, and illuminating. The whole stands on a silver-mounted ebony basement, and reflects the greatest credit upon the manufacturers. The cost of it was two hundred guineas, and it serves the double purpose of a central ornament and a fruit or flower stand.

TESTIMONIAL PRESENTED TO MR. W. I. PALMER, OF READING.

ROYAL NATIONAL LIFE-BOAT INSTITUTION.

The annual general meeting of the subscribers and friends of the Royal National Life-Boat Institution was held last Saturday at Willis's Rooms, St. James's—the Duke of Northumberland, president, in the chair. The report stated that during the past year twenty-eight new life-boats were sent to the coast, this number being greatly in excess of that dispatched from the institution's store-yard in any one year since 1866. Ten of these boats were for new stations; the remainder replaced boats at existing stations. In addition to this, twenty-five new life-boats are being got ready, nine for new and sixteen for old stations. The total number of life-boats under the management of the committee at the close of the year 1884 was 284, which were launched on service 252 times between Jan. 1 and Dec. 31, and saved no less than 633 lives and eighteen vessels. Besides this, 159 lives were saved from shipwreck by shore-boats and other means, all of which services were rewarded by the institution, making up a total of 792 lives rescued during the year, for which six silver medals and clasps, nine votes of thanks on vellum, and £5000, were granted by the committee, including payments to widows and orphans of life-boatmen who had lost their lives in the service prior to the publication of the last annual report, no fatal accidents having happened to the gallant life-boatmen since that period. Altogether, from its foundation, the institution had voted 97 gold medals, 970 silver medals, and £82,984 in cash for saving 31,355 lives from shipwrecks on our coasts. The financial statement showed that the subscriptions, donations, dividends, &c., amounted during the past year to £44,810, which included £600 from the Commissioners of the International Fisheries Exhibition, as a prize for the best life-boat, £8600 in special gifts for expenses connected with fourteen life-boats, and £1000 for the endowment of a life-boat. Several legacies were also received. The total expenditure for the past year was £52,724.

Patrick Leary was sentenced at Cork Assizes on Monday to twelve months' imprisonment for an attempt to blow up the Mill-street police barracks with an infernal machine. The Judge said that instead of twelve months he would have given the prisoner twenty years, but that he was convinced Leary was only the tool of the principals in the plot, who, it was to be regretted, were still at large.

MUSSULMAN PILGRIMS FROM PERSIA ON

H THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

THE COURT.

Earl Sydney, G.C.B., Lord Steward, had an audience of the Queen on Thursday week and presented an address from the House of Lords, humbly thanking her Majesty for having graciously accepted the loyal offer of military service from New South Wales, and expressing the satisfaction with which the House of Lords has heard the announcement that the like loyal offer of military service from other colonies and also from India will, should occasion arise, be duly accepted. The Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, the Earl and Countess of Rosebery, and Lieutenant-General Sir A. Alison, Bart., K.C.B., arrived at the castle yesterday week, and had the honour of dining with her Majesty and the Royal family. General the Right Hon. Sir Henry Ponsonby had also the honour of being invited. Princess Beatrice presented the prizes to the successful students of the Windsor and Eton art classes at the Albert Institute last Saturday afternoon. Lord Rowton arrived at the castle in the evening, and had the honour of dining with her Majesty and the Royal family. Sir William Jenner, Bart., K.C.B., had also the honour of being invited. On Sunday the Queen, Princess Beatrice, Prince Louis and Prince Henry of Battenberg, and the members of her Majesty's household, attended Divine service in the private chapel. The Very Rev. R. Davidson, Dean of Windsor, assisted by the Rev. Henry Wace, D.D., Principal of King's College, London, and Honorary Chaplain to the Queen, officiated. The Rev. Dr. Wace preached the sermon. The Queen received the sad intelligence of the death, at Darmstadt, after a few days' illness, of Princess Charles of Hesse, the beloved mother of the Grand Duke of Hesse. In consequence of the death of her Royal Highness, her Majesty will go from England direct to Aix-les-Bains, visiting Darmstadt on the return journey. The Queen goes to Aix-les-Bains, by the advice of her Majesty's physicians, for change of air, rest, and quiet; and neither her Majesty nor Princess Beatrice has ever proposed to take any course of waters, baths, or other treatment at Aix. Prince Louis and Prince Henry of Battenberg, who were on a visit to the Queen at Windsor Castle, left Windsor on Monday afternoon for Hesse-Darmstadt, to be present at the funeral of their aunt, Princess Elizabeth. Her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and the Royal suite, will leave Portsmouth on Monday next for Cherbourg, en route for Aix-les-Bains. It is officially announced that the Queen's birthday will be kept on Saturday, June 6.

The Prince of Wales, with Prince Albert Victor and the Duke of Edinburgh, arrived in Berlin on Thursday, where they were met at the station by the Crown Prince and Princess of Germany, whom they accompanied to the Palace of the Crown Prince. Next morning the Prince of Wales, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor and the Duke of Edinburgh, paid a lengthened visit to the Emperor and Empress of Germany, who received them with the utmost cordiality. The Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh wore their Prussian uniform, Prince Albert Victor being in an English uniform. They also visited other members of the Imperial family, and subsequently paid a visit to Prince Bismarck, which was followed by visits to the foreign Ambassadors. In the afternoon and evening the Prince of Wales received many visits. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, and Prince Albert Victor were present at some artillery practice at the Tegel range, and afterwards visited the panorama of the battle of Sedan. On Saturday last their Royal Highnesses lunched with the Emperor, and in the evening dined with the Crown Prince. On Sunday, the eighty-eighth anniversary of the Emperor's birthday, our Court was represented by the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, and Prince Victor. On Monday morning Prince Albert Victor went to Potsdam with his cousin, Prince Wilhelm, and saw the 1st Regiment of Guards on parade. In the evening the Prince of Wales and Prince Albert Victor, left Berlin for Darmstadt. The Crown Prince, Crown Princess, Princess Victoria, Prince and Princess Christian, and others went to the station to see them off. Their Royal Highnesses attended the funeral of the Dowager Grand Duchess of Hesse, which took place on Wednesday morning, proceeding the same day to Brussels, where they were guests of the King of the Belgians, returning to England on Friday. The Duke of Edinburgh left Berlin on Monday night for Coburg. The Princess of Wales and Prince George of Wales were present at the first performance of Mr. Pinero's new play, "The Magistrate," last Saturday evening. Her Royal Highness was present at the performance given at the Criterion Theatre on Wednesday morning, in aid of the Princess of Wales's Branch of the National Aid Society (Egypt and Soudan). Cheltnam's comedy, "A Lesson in Love," was played by Lady Monckton, Miss Larkin, Miss Wyndham, Sir Charles Young, Mr. Beerbohm Tree, and Mr. Charles Wyndham. An address, specially written for the occasion by Mr. Clement Scott, was delivered by Mrs. Keeley and Mrs. Stirling. The Princess has granted her patronage to the United Kingdom Beneficent Association, and sent a cheque for £25 to the funds. The association grants annuities to persons of the upper classes in reduced circumstances, and has in this way distributed £88,554.

The Duchess of Edinburgh visited yesterday week the Art Exhibition, held under the patronage of the Duchess of Leeds at Belgrave-square, in aid of the Girls' Friendly Society's Club.

On Sunday his Excellency Count Münster gave a banquet at the German Embassy, Carlton House-terrace, in celebration of the anniversary of the birthday of the Emperor of Germany. Covers were laid for twenty-six.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

The marriage of Sir E. Malet, C.B., British Ambassador at Berlin, with Lady Ermyntrude Russell, daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, was solemnised on the 19th inst. by special license at Westminster Abbey. Four o'clock was the hour fixed for the ceremony, but long before that time arrived the sacred edifice was crowded in every available part by an aristocratic gathering. Awaiting the arrival of the bride, the attention of the congregation was, of course, directed to the bridesmaids, who were six in number—Lady Edeline Sackville, Lady Egidia Abney-Hastings, Lady Mary Sackville, Miss Ella St. LoMalet, Miss Cecilie Sackville West, and Miss Flora Russell. Their pretty costumes were much admired. They consisted of dresses of stripes of white duchesse satin and frize, the draperies and bodices being of soft sicilene silk, with a broad sash of moire ribbon. Hats en suite, with large aigrettes. The bride, who was accompanied by her mother, was met at the Abbey doors by her father, who conducted her to the altar, and gave her away. His Grace wore the star of the Order of the Garter. The Duchess of Bedford wore a magnificent dress of green velvet trimmed with gold braid. The bride was attired in a superb costume—a triumph of millinery art. The train and bodice was of rich brocaded velvet, embossed with roses of fine silver wire, and picked out with exquisite pearls. The petticoat was of white duchesse satin, richly trimmed with point d'Alençon, and dotted over with small sprays of orange-blossoms. The veil was also of point d'Alençon, and was fastened to the hair by a spray of diamonds, and surmounted by a small wreath of orange-blossoms. During the ceremony a new anthem was sung, composed for the occasion by Sir Arthur Sullivan. The officiating clergy were the Right Rev. the Bishop of Winchester and the Dean of Westminster. Mr. Graham, of Netherby, acted as best man. At the conclusion of the ceremony the bridal party adjourned to the town residence of the Duke of Bedford, 81, Eaton-square. Later in the day Sir Edward and Lady Malet left town for Holwood, near Bromley, in Kent, one of Lord Derby's country seats, where they intend spending part of their honeymoon. The bride's travelling-dress was of a peculiar shade—between old gold and green—of velvet and cashmere, richly trimmed with gold braid, with jacket, hat, and muff to match. The wedding presents numbered upwards of three hundred, and were of an unusually costly description, including a number of articles of very valuable jewellery. Her Majesty sent an Indian shawl and a pair of blue-and-gold china vases. The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk contributed a massive gold tea and coffee service, while the Duke and Duchess of Bedford's gifts to their daughter comprised some magnificent sets of gems. Sir Edward Malet received numerous presents on the occasion of his marriage. The Prince of Wales sent his Excellency a handsome silver cigarette-box, and Sir Richard Wallace the K.C.B.'s star in diamonds.

Major Francis Harwood Poore, one of the Duke of Edinburgh's Equeries, and Lady Harriot Elizabeth Grimston, Lady-in-Waiting to the Duchess of Edinburgh, and eldest daughter of the Earl of Verulam, were married on Tuesday in the Cathedral of St. Albans. The Duchess of Edinburgh, accompanied by her son Prince Alfred, was present. She was received by a guard of honour of the 2nd Hertfordshire Volunteers. Mr. G. V. Poore acted as best man to the bridegroom; and the bridesmaids were Lady Jane Grimston, sister of the bride, Lady Jane Alexander, Miss Mackintosh, and the Hon. Helen and Hon. Hermione Grimston, daughters of Lord and Lady Grimston. On the arrival of the bride she was received by her brother, Lord Grimston, by whom she was conducted to the altar. The Rev. Benjamin Hutchinson, Vicar of St. Michael's, St. Albans, officiated, assisted by the Venerable Archdeacon Lawrence. Lord Verulam gave his daughter away. The Duchess of Edinburgh attested the register. As the wedding party quitted the abbey, the organist played the Wedding March. Lord and Lady Verulam received the Duchess and a large party at breakfast at their neighbouring residence, Gorhambury.

The marriage of the Hon. Helen A. Brodrick, second daughter of Viscount Midleton, with the Rev. Archibald Ean Campbell, M.A., eldest son of the late Colonel Walter Campbell, of Skipness, N.B., and Rector of Castle Rising, Norfolk, is fixed to take place at Peper Harow on April 14.

The marriage arranged between Captain Hubert Galton and Miss Emily Clifford will take place in London on April 22.

A marriage is arranged, and will shortly take place, between Captain Avedale Corbett Singleton, R.N., and Miss Ada Taylour, third daughter of Colonel Lord John Taylour, and grand-daughter of the late Marquis of Headfort.

A marriage is arranged between Mr. Josceline Bagot, Grenadier Guards, of Levens Hall, Westmoreland, eldest son of the late Colonel Charles Bagot, and Miss Dosia Leslie, third daughter of Sir John and Lady Leslie.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, March 25.

Under the pressure of a further large addition to the unemployed balance, the Bank of England directors have reduced the standard rate of discount to 3½ per cent. We may take for granted that the seeming improvement in the Afghan difficulty helped to turn the scale, but the reduction is so small that its chief merit is the relief it affords to those who pay interest on deposits. The other banks now allow 2½ for money left with them, and this shows a margin of profit on the rates obtained in the employment of such money. But another week has passed, and we are apparently no nearer the settlement of the difficulty with Russia, and at the time of writing there is such a revival of anxiety in regard to the subject, that British, Russian, and many other stocks are once more suffering from excess of sales. So far, the relapse has not been material, but it registers the return of uneasiness.

For commercial people, the "times" are no doubt bad all over the world, but it is comforting to see how well the banks are pulling through. Just now we are having quite a run of reports from Australian banks. As many as nine such documents are waiting notice, and in every case the dividend is the same as that paid last year. The Commercial of Sydney pays 25 per cent; the Bank of New South Wales, 17½; the National of Australasia, 16; the Queensland National and the Bank of New Zealand, 15; the Australian Joint Stock, 12½; the Bank of Victoria, and the English, Scottish, and Australian, 10; and the Commercial Bank of South Australia, 8.

When trade is bad and values low, fires increase. To that there is no exception in any part of the world, and hence it is not surprising that insurance companies should be doing less well now than they used to. A revision of rates is, in many cases, helping to make this less noticeable; but the Alliance dividend is 15 per cent as against 17½, and the Equitable 5 against 10, while the London and Provincial have reduced their credit balance to profit and loss from £7688 to £2011. The report of the Fire Insurance Association is in some respects very special. £100,000 has been added to profit and loss from capital, and a reserve fund of £50,000 has also been so applied. Both these sums have been absorbed, and 1885 begins with £29,481 to credit of profit and loss; in addition, however, to £101,519, being one third of the net premium income of 1884.

Our investments for services in foreign cities are numerous and varied, but they are not always remunerative, as witness money spent in Spain and Russia on water which few people care to use; but, on the other hand, we have many good investments of this description. The Ottoman Gas Company are to pay 8 per cent per annum for the past half-year, making 7½ per cent for the year. The comparison is with 7 for 1883. The Rio de Janeiro City Improvements Company again pay 6 per cent. The Montevideo Waterworks Company is to pay 2½ for 1884.

A dividend of 5 per cent is announced by the British American Land Company; but, as with the Canada Company, there is no surplus this year to apply to the reduction of the number of shares. Land-owning companies generally find that a fair dividend is the minimum result of an established company, with large realisations on capital account during periods of prosperity.

The troubles in the East are favourable to the telegraph services to Egypt and India, but in some other directions cable property is not thriving. The Anglo-American Telegraph dividend for the quarter ending with March is 4s. per cent, as compared with 12s. 6d; and the Direct Spanish Telegraph Company is not able to pay the preference dividend for the past half-year.

The Channel Squadron, which arrived in Milford Haven on the 25th inst., will proceed on April 7 to Holyhead, to escort the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland.

MARCH SNOW.

A sad little wind moaned round the house, and, occasionally waxing more violent, threw itself against the windows, and then was heard no more. Occasionally, a tiny something fluttered down through the darkened atmosphere—and we presaged rain. But, as the heavy clouds began to roll up with the sunset and to bank themselves low down on the horizon, we looked at the soft brown flush on the trees in the distance, and at the amber graceful catkins dancing rhythmically in the wind; we scented the pungent aromatic odour of the golden gorse; we noted the yellow dust on the grey-velvet palms in the hollow; and we said, of course, such a thing is ridiculous, but if this were January, or even February, we should expect snow before morning, but as it is March—as spring is already here—of course it is impossible!

But, impossible or not, the something that had attracted our notice in the grey gloom of the early evening became tangible as the night waxed older. The wind became keen and penetrating, as it only does when snow is in the air; the fire burned frostily; and, when morning dawned, the birds were silent, for they were awed and rendered dumb by a sight that is rare in mid-winter, but is an almost impossible, utterly detested, wholly horrible one in March, when the rooks are sitting, and in some cases have little ones to feed for; and when Nature, like the Princess in the fairy-tale, is only waiting for the kiss of her lover, the moist, south-west wind, to wake up in one moment and give us back the unspeakable joy of her presence to reign over the whole world of flowers.

Yesterday the violets were scenting the air; prim little polyanthuses, that remind us always of soft tortoise-shell kittens—we know not why—were beginning to creep out of their sheltering leaves; here and there a double daffodil was nodding his yellow head and exchanging experiences with the wallflowers in the border beyond; the lauristinas were a sheet of blossom; the lilacs were beginning to bud; the chestnut-trees were all in a hurry about their new spring garments; one mad little swallow was skimming the surface of a neighbour's pond; every bird had something to say, and said it; green tufts, like studs of emerald, decked the thorn-trees, and made us remember how lovely May-blossom is; the pink almond-trees in the neighbours' gardens were already like a Japanese sketch in brown and salmon-colour; a pear-tree was tufted with white; and, in fact, every fresh hour—so it seemed to us—had its own sweet surprise, and we lived from day to day to welcome back some dear friend or acquaintance in the shape of bird or flower or tree, being sure of their appearing, and of their being as sweet and as delightful as they invariably are—for Nature's children are always the same, and never fail one or disappoint one, as so many of our human friends do.

But alas! this was yesterday: now we lie discreet and chill, hidden under the clean, white, untimely mantle of a March snowstorm. The flowers are completely buried; paths, beds, and banks are level; the sides and branches of the trees are covered with snow; and the wretched little birds, that yesterday despised crumbs, and intimated politely that worms were ever so much better and nicer, come and beg shamelessly; while the robin, who had just gone completely out of fashion, sents himself on the gate, preens his feathers, puffs out his scarlet waistcoat, and then opens his beak and sings, as much as to say, "After all, I was right and you were wrong, and you should not have been in such a hurry to get rid of me, for I am the only bird who is at all in character with this wintry scene." The heavy grey sky seems to lie on the top of the trees, a rushing wind drives the thick flakes until they are piled against the window on the north-east side of the house and render it opaque, while the snow itself falls in the thin, small, powdery form that means mischief, and that piles up swifter than any other kind into a barrier that is as successful in keeping us indoors as if it were a stream of water—so wetting, so penetrating, so impossible is it to pass and keep ourselves from looking as if we had gone through a dirty and wide river in our struggles to go out.

As the day grows older, of course the snow ceases. After all, it is March snow, and has grace enough to know it has no business here, and is utterly and shamelessly detestable. But in the park opposite, the pure white blanket shows no sign of melting. The paternal rooks, wretched with the cares of housekeeping (as wretched as we were, by-the-way, when there was no milkman before 9.30, and a whole nestful of birdlings were clamouring for breakfast—delayed by the snow an hour beyond even Sunday-morning time), hop about and sink into it hopelessly, seeking for the absent worm. With each separate gust the wind denudes an entire tree of its white covering. From the roof every now and then descend small avalanches; and the sky, becoming a pale steely blue, almost suggests skating in a manner that causes our hearts to sink into our boots, and remain there, as we think of the cold, ungenial time, and the manner in which our hopes have been blighted. Still, about mid-day the sun creeps out and asserts himself; the bees in the garden cease to be level with the paths; yellow spears, which were once crocuses, beginning to pierce the lumps of snow; the shrubs, that looked like breaking with their burden, slip it off their shoulders and stand erect; one after the other well-known landmarks reappear; we can see the buds on the hedges are just where they were yesterday; and a gentle drip-drip-drip from the eaves and an angry constant twittering from the sparrows prove that we are not long to be buried or kept in a state of siege and separation from our fellow-men, that is trying in January, but simply maddening in March—when a young man's fancy should be turning lightly towards thoughts of love, if the poet speaks correctly, and when a young woman's goes straight to her garments, and causes her to spend her days in dreaming of light gowns and pretty chintzes in which to disport herself; when even the earth itself puts on new clothes.

Upton House Industrial School for Truant Children, which has just been completed at Homerton to accommodate one hundred boys, was inspected on Monday evening by a number of ladies and gentleman, on the invitation of Mr. H. Spicer, chairman of the Industrial Schools Committee of the London School Board.

Policies of assurance for £47,000 on the life of Mr. Henry Roe, aged sixty, who spent a quarter of a million sterling in restoring Christ Church Cathedral and built the National Synod Hall for the Irish Protestant Church, were sold in Dublin, last Saturday, for £11,500, the surrender value being about £6900 and the annual premiums £2600. No offer was made for Mr. Roe's residence, Mount Anville Park, on which he spent £20,000.

At the meeting of the Royal Geographical Society on Monday evening—Lord Aberdare, president, in the chair—General Walker read a paper by Major Holdich, R.E., on the country to the north of Herat, which he described as a fertile country, pointing out the boundaries and the principal physical features of the territory. A note was read by M. Lessar, in which he spoke of the country as barren and almost waterless. He also protested against believing that the maps now in existence should be considered evidence with regard to the boundary question.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, March 24.

The questions of taxing imported cereals and cattle having passed under the consideration of the Senate, together with the interminable Budget discussion, the Chamber of Deputies has returned to the already worn subject of electoral reform. M. Constans proposes the adoption of the scrutin de liste instead of the actual scrutin d'arrondissement, and the fixing of the number of deputies on the basis of the number of the population. M. Constans, however, has a clause to the effect that, for the next Legislature, each department shall have at least as many deputies as it has at present. Thus, supposing the bill be voted as originally framed, the new Chamber of Deputies would number 610 deputies, as compared with the present Chamber, which counts only 557. The scrutin de liste passed, as it has been to-day by 412 votes against 99, the present Chamber has done all the useful and interesting work that it can do. Naturally, everybody is discounting the results which the new voting system will give, and, according to the calculations of the learned in such matters, the Conservatives and the Radicals will each gain at least fifty votes, a fact which will terribly mar the compactness and practicality of the Opportunist majority.

There is much talk now going on about the decay of the theatre: the minor theatres, which trust to the talent of a "star" and the wit of her patented purveyors of text, are on the brink of failure; the Comédie Française is driving the poets from its doors by the pretentiousness of its actors; the Opéra is struggling vainly against immense expenses and a mediocre company. There is some exaggeration in these absolute statements; but it is certain that most of the Paris theatres are doing a very poor business, and the new pieces recently brought out are failures after failures. The favourite "divas" of the past ten years—Judic, Granier, Chaumont—fail to attract the public, and the old vaudevillists and wits see their hastily written pieces fall as hastily. The fact is that for years past the French theatres have been conducted on a rotten system of "puffery," which has been rendered possible by the miserable venality of the French press. Journals like the Figaro and the Gaulois, for instance, have regularly-signed contracts with a theatre like the Gymnase for puffing and writing up pieces played there. Furthermore, a number of journalists, formed into a kind of occult and informal syndicate, monopolise the minor theatres like the Variétés, the Nouveautés, and the Palais Royal, for their own benefit. For some time these little arrangements went along quietly, and the innocent public swallowed the "puffs"; but now there is no longer any secret about it, the puffs are losing their influence, and as the theatres are producing miserably poor pieces, the public does not take the trouble to go to see them. Hence the catastrophe which is now affecting alike managers, actors, and authors.

An exhibition of electricity is now open in the Observatory. Since the exhibition at the Palais de l'Industrie in 1881, no very striking invention appears to have been made in electrical science, but the improvements and perfections are numerous. The application of electricity as a motive-power for machinery, electric projectors as now used in the French Navy, railway signals, incandescent lamps, the accumulation of electricity, the telephone, &c., have all been vastly improved by various inventors here represented. At the Observatory, too, we see electricity applied to chemical analysis, and to the detection of poison in animal bodies. The Ministry of Posts and Telegraphs exhibits a number of interesting apparatus, including the standard ohm, the basis of the calculations of modern electrical science.

The anniversary of March 18 has now become a fête, rather than a pretext for revolutionary pilgrimages. The visit to the cemeteries and to the graves of the Fédérés is reserved for the month of May. Amongst the deputies who celebrated the Commune were MM. Lissant and Clovis Hugues, of whom the latter terminated his speech with the words: "Vive la Commune, parce qu' elle est la Justice." T. C.

On Sunday Friedrich Wilhelm Ludwig, first German Emperor and seventh King of Prussia, entered upon the eighty-ninth year of a life the importance of which to civilised mankind is almost without precedent or parallel in history. Owing to the Emperor having a slight cold, the congratulatory visits were limited to the members of the Royal family, the foreign Princes, and the princely personages permanently residing in Prussia, the latter including the Imperial Chancellor. Notwithstanding wintry weather, Berlin, and indeed all Germany, celebrated the birthday of the Emperor William with much enthusiasm on Sunday. Vast crowds assembled before the Imperial Palace, and heartily cheered the princely personages as they arrived to congratulate the Emperor. His Majesty, although suffering from a slight cold, appeared at a window and bowed his acknowledgments to the assembled people. In the evening the city was illuminated.—The Duchess Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Schwerin was confirmed on Tuesday at Potsdam, in presence of the Crown Prince and Princess, Princess William, Princess Victoria, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg, Prince Albert of Prussia, and many other Princes.

The Austrian Emperor has addressed to the Emperor William an autograph letter, couched in the most cordial language, congratulating the German Sovereign upon his eighty-eighth birthday. The German residents in Vienna met at a banquet in the Hôtel Métropole in celebration of the event.—The Austrian Crown Prince and Princess had an enthusiastic reception from the Montenegrins on their arrival at Cettinje last Saturday, Prince Nikita and his Ministers meeting them at the frontier.—On Sunday evening the Crown Prince and Princess started from Cattaro for Fiume on board the Imperial yacht Miramar on their way home. The Archduke John of Austria has accepted Prince Nicholas's invitation to prolong his stay in Montenegro.—In the sitting of the Lower House of the Reichsrath on the 19th, the discussion of the Budget was concluded, and the Financial Bill adopted without debate, and in accordance with the proposals of the committee.

On Monday the Viceroy left Calcutta for Rawul Pindi to meet the Ameer of Afghanistan. It is stated by the Bombay Gazette that the Duke of Connaught will attend the durbar at Rawul Pindi.—Great activity prevails in the Commissariat Department at Bombay, orders having been received to provide supplies for an army corps of 25,000 men, destined for Quetta. On Tuesday the Viceroy met Sir Donald Stewart, and sanctioned the mobilisation of two army corps, each to consist of 25,000 men. These troops are to be sent to Pisheen, with a reserve force of 10,000 men. Sir Donald Stewart will take the supreme command of the whole force. Supplies for 50,000 men for six months are being sent into Pisheen.—The Indian Budget has been published in the form of a minute in the official Gazette. The accounts for 1883-4 show a surplus of £1,387,496, which is due partly to increase of revenue over expenditure, and partly to collections of land revenue which would ordinarily have fallen due in the ensuing year. The revised Estimates for 1884-5 show a deficit of £716,200, which is attributed partly to the accelerated payment of land revenue above mentioned, partly to the suspension of revenue, and partly to the falling off in railway receipts. The minute then draws attention to the stagnation of the wheat and rice trades. The Budget Estimates for 1885-6 are:—Revenue, £72,090,400; expenditure, £71,582,300.

According to an Act of the Samoan Parliament, the islands have been formally annexed to New Zealand.

COLONIAL CHURCH-BUILDING.

Trinity Church, Bermuda, is one of two new new buildings shown in our Illustrations. This church, designed by Messrs. Hay and Henderson, architects, of Edinburgh, replaces a smaller one, in the Early English style, built about thirty years ago, and destroyed, on Jan. 27 last year, by an incendiary supposed to be connected with the Fenian organisation. The new edifice consists of a nave, with lateral aisles, a central tower, with transepts, and a choir, also with lateral aisles. The length of the nave is 100 ft., width, 33 ft.; width of aisles, 14 ft. 6 in.; width of transept, 32 ft. 6 in., and length, 28 ft. 3 in. The tower is 32 ft. square; the length of the choir, 44 ft. 6 in.; the height of the nave to the wall-head, 44 ft., and of the aisles, 20 ft.; the height to the apex of the nave and choir from the floor is 72 ft.; and the height of the tower and spire, 220 ft. The walls are of native stone, dressed with Caen stone inside and out; the piers of the nave and choir are massive monoliths of polished Peterhead granite; the roof of the choir is vaulted with the beautiful native cedar, and those of the nave and transepts are of open construction, in cedar and pitch-pine; the aisles and porches are vaulted in stone, and are practically fireproof. The site of this church is the highest ground in the town of Hamilton, the capital of the islands; and the tower, provided with a clock, will be a conspicuous object. There will be a fine organ in the choir; and provision has been made for a large peal of bells in the tower. There will be sittings for 1200 persons, a considerable portion being free for the use of the Army and Navy, and of the large and annually increasing numbers of visitors from the neighbouring continent, who make Bermuda their winter quarters.

The other Illustration is that of a new Presbyterian Church in the city of Dunedin, Otago, in the southern part of New Zealand. The Otago settlement was founded in 1848, by emigrant Scotchmen of the Free Kirk; and though, in the present constitution of local society, there is no predominating sectarian element, the Presbyterians number as many adherents as all other Protestant denominations together. Dunedin is the largest town in New Zealand, having at the Census of 1851, with its suburbs, 35,000 inhabitants, many of whom, engaged in trade, have come from Melbourne. They form the most enterprising community in the whole colony, and have an increasing commerce. The city is finely situated nine miles up the inlet of Port Chalmers, but has seaside suburbs within a very short distance. Its public buildings, the Townhall, Post Office, Custom House, University, High School, Museum, Hospital, and Garrison Hall, are stately and handsome. High-street, Princes-street, and George-street, are full of good shops, and are traversed by convenient tramways; the hotels and many private houses are equal to those of a flourishing English or Scottish great town. The University of Otago, the High Schools, and various educational and charitable institutions are hardly surpassed by similar establishments in our provincial towns at home. There is a well-kept Botanic Garden, with special acclimatisation grounds, which are both ornamental and of real utility in a new country. In short, Dunedin represents all that is best in the civilisation of Great Britain, reproduced at the Antipodes; and the habits of its citizens, preserved by an invigorating climate, promise it a great future in the world of the Southern Ocean.

TRINITY CHURCH, BERMUDA.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH AT DUNEDIN, OTAGO, NEW ZEALAND.

THE LATE MR. LOUIS HAGHE,
FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE ROYAL INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

THE LATE MR. J. J. JENKINS,
FORMER SECRETARY OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

THE LATE MR. LOUIS HAGHE.

Mr. Louis Haghe, the Honorary President of the Institute of Painters in Water Colours, died on the 9th inst., at the age of seventy-nine. His long and successful career bore testimony to the charms which the fatherland has for the imaginative mind. Born at Tournay—a picturesque but seldom-visited town of Belgium—he came to England at an early age, and for some years devoted himself almost wholly to lithography, an art which then occupied a far higher position than it has since wood-engraving, electrotype, and photography have competed with it for popular favour. Mr. Haghe at first commenced by lithographing the works of others, and in this way, between 1824 and 1847, he made his name widely known by his attractive album of English, Belgian, and German scenery. Thenceforward he devoted himself to original work, commencing by a series of studies of the archæological and architectural beauties of his native country. Old Flemish interiors, fifteenth-century burghers' houses, looking almost like palaces, Gothic cathedrals, and the rich costumes of the Middle Ages always attracted him. He had, however, for some years been exhibiting at the Institute of Painters in Water Colours and elsewhere, and in 1837 was elected a member of that body, of which he became one of the leading members. His position as an artist was established by the "Council of War at Courtray," assembled in the Hôtel de Ville. This picture, exhibited in 1839, was purchased by Mr. Vernon, and formed part of his bequest now at the South Kensington Museum. Amongst Louis Haghe's other noteworthy works may be mentioned "The Interior of the Hôtel de Ville, Bruges"; "The Brewer's Hall, Antwerp"; "Interior of St. Bavon, Ghent"; "Cross-bow Practice" (a scene of Flemish outdoor life in the sixteenth century); "The Choir of Santa Maria Novella" (oil), "St. Peter's Day at Rome," &c. His work, to the very close of his life, was almost uninterrupted; and to the very end he contributed to the exhibition of the Institute of which he had for so long been one of of the principal members. Honours were abundantly showered upon him from all sides. Antwerp, Brussels, Paris, and Manchester awarded him medals; and the King of the Belgians conferred upon him the Order of Chevalier de l'Ordre de Léopold I. He succeeded the late Mr. Henry Warren as President of the Institute, and held the post until about a year ago, when, from failing health, he resigned in favour of Mr. J. D. Linton. The Portrait is from a photograph by M. J. Ganz, of Brussels.

THE LATE MR. J. J. JENKINS, F.R.S.A.

Mr. Joseph J. Jenkins, who died on the 9th inst., was an artist whose works gained a considerable degree of favour. His pictures bearing suggestive titles, "Hopes and Fears," "With the Stream," and "Against the Stream," and "Come Along," were popular in their day; and in some instances were engraved for the Art Union. He was born in 1811; in early life he was an engraver, but afterwards became a painter in water colours. His works, both of figure-subjects and landscapes, were till recently seen and admired at the annual exhibitions of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours, of which he was a most active and useful member during thirty-four years, having also for ten years filled the office of Secretary, during the Presidencies of Mr. Frederick Tayler and the late John F. Lewis, R.A. He became an Associate of the Society in 1841, and a full member in 1850. His latter years were devoted to the service of the society, which he enriched by valuable gifts, and lastly by a magnificent bequest to the funds. Mr. Jenkins was also known to have been long engaged in collecting materials for its history.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Mr. H. S. Melville, East Grinstead.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN: THE NILE AT THE HEAD OF THE GERENDID CATARACT.
SKETCH BY THE LATE LIEUTENANT-COLONEL R. C. COVENY, OF THE 42ND (BLACK WATCH) ROYAL HIGHLANDERS.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The Earl of Dufferin, as resolute and resourceful a Viceroy as India has ever had, is plainly a match for Russia, whose singular and suspicious delay in dispatching her Commissioner to meet General Sir Peter Lumsden on the debateable Afghan Frontier is not unreasonably held to mask acquisitive designs on the part of restless Muscovite Commanders. On his way to meet the Ameer of Afghanistan in state at Rawul Pindi, the Governor-General met Sir Donald Stewart, the Commander-in-Chief, at Allahabad on Tuesday; and is understood to have sanctioned the mobilisation of two Army Corps of 25,000 men each, Sir Donald himself taking the chief command, with General Sir Frederick Roberts and General Hardinge as Commanders of the two Army Corps, Pisheen being the immediate destination of the troops. These important military measures being deemed necessary by the Viceroy to prepare for eventualities, it is more than ever evident that at this juncture England has urgent need to speak with an undivided voice.

The strength of the Government at this crisis lies in the manifest necessity for the country to show a united front towards Russia. Threatened by yet another hostile motion by the Opposition on the question of the finances of Egypt, Mr. Gladstone last Monday deprecated the delay in the debate which Sir Stafford Northcote desired on the score that the House had not yet mastered the papers. The Premier earnestly protested, "I cannot undertake the risk of Egyptian bankruptcy in order to meet the wishes of the right hon. gentleman. We are now at the end of our tether, and in the month of April Egypt will be called upon to meet payments which she will have no means of meeting unless we are able to put in operation the machinery of the Convention." With lively debating point Lord John Manners promptly retorted that, "having brought the financial affairs of Egypt to a state of hopeless confusion, the Prime Minister now presents a pistol at our heads, and declares that bankruptcy will ensue unless this Convention be adopted."

Thursday was, in the end, fixed upon as the date for Mr. Gladstone, on the part of the Government, to move the subjoined resolution practically approving the Egyptian Convention:—

That her Majesty be authorised to guarantee the payment of an annuity of £315,000 sterling for the purpose of a loan, to be raised by the Government of Egypt, in pursuance of the Convention signed at London, on March 18, 1885, between her Majesty and the Governments of Austria-Hungary, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, and Turkey; and that provision be made out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, or the growing produce thereof, for the issue of such sums of money from time to time as may be required, to pay any sums which may at any time be required to fulfil the guarantee of her Majesty in respect of such annuity, conformably to the tenor of her Majesty's engagement as specified in the said convention.

The Opposition elected to join issue with the Government under the banner of Mr. T. C. Bruce, who gave notice of an amendment to the effect that the proposals regarding the Egyptian Convention were unsatisfactory, and did not warrant the agreement into which her Majesty's Government had entered. On the grounds that the Convention virtually sanctions the reimposition of an International Commission of Interference in the affairs of Egypt, when England has borne the brunt of the expense and trouble of the Administration throughout recent troublous times, some uncertain followers of the Ministry were expected to vote with the Opposition. But again the spectre of Russia on the Afghan frontier may check them, as it may lessen the force of the Opposition.

On the delicate questions arising out of the present positions of the Russian and Afghan outposts on the Turkestan frontier, Ministers in both Houses have displayed diplomatic reticence and reserve. "Heckled" (as the Scots put it) with regard to alleged Russian intrigues at Pendjeh, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice was not to be shaken, on Tuesday, from the reserve with which he had discreetly cloaked himself. Nor was Mr. Gladstone to be swerved one step from the guarded course he deemed it politic to follow—as he remarked, in passing, under "the very grave circumstances which now exist"—in alluding to the negotiations with Russia as to whether the frontier difficulty should be settled on the spot or in London.

The Redistribution of Seats Bill is sedulously pushed through Committee by Sir Charles Dilke in the intervals left by one or the other of the Ministers in charge of the spending departments. The Marquis of Hartington, who has not yet mastered the art of marshalling figures with ease, on Thursday week prevailed upon the House to vote, with accustomed alacrity, 114,194 men and £4,543,000 for the Army. In the Upper House, on the following night, 62 voted for and 62 against Lord Thurlow's motion in favour of opening the London Museums and Picture Galleries on Sundays; the Lord Chancellor adding his casting-vote against the annual resolution, which the promoters now have hope will be sanctioned next year. On the whole, their Lordships will not be sorry to adjourn on Friday for the Easter holidays; nor will the Commons object to begin their recess, which is to last from Tuesday next to Thursday, the 9th of April.

Earl Cairns presided on Tuesday at the nineteenth annual meeting of the Society for Promoting Female Welfare, held, by permission of Mr. and Mrs. Holmes White, at 10, Devonshire-place, at which it was decided to raise a special fund from which to make grants to societies needing support.

"OPHELIA."

There is a willow grows aslant a brook,
That shows his hoar leaves in the glassy stream;
There with fantastic garlands did she come,
Of crow-flowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples
That our cold maids do "dead men's fingers" call them;
There, on the pendant boughs her coronet weeds
Clambering to hang, an envious sliver broke;
When, down the weedy trophies, and herself,
Fell in the weeping brook.
* * * *
Alas, then, is she drowned?
Drowned, drowned, your sister's drowned, Laertes.

The prelude of this sad event is depicted by the Artist in the drawing we have engraved. The genius of Shakspeare, with its profound and tender reach of human sympathy, has imagined nothing that more touches the heart than this portion of the mysterious tragedy of "Hamlet." Much of poor Ophelia's story is left untold, but may perhaps be guessed by a thoughtful reader. The priests condemned her as a suicide, and forbade her the rites of Christian burial. The King of Denmark supposed that her madness was "all from her father's death." The Queen, who had loved and really pitied her, had a different opinion of its cause; and we know what Laertes thought of it, and what her father, as well as her brother, had feared. The wild talk and strange songs in which her wandering mind gave vent to its emotions, breaking the bounds of maidenly self-respect, betray the true state of the case. Laertes was right in his belief that she was greatly wronged. His anger is justified, for he could not be aware of the terrible position of Hamlet. The Queen said, casting flowers on Ophelia's grave, "I hoped thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife." Laertes, before he left home, had cautioned his sister:

For Hamlet, and the trifling of his favours,
Hold it a fashion and a toy in blood.
Fear it, Ophelia, fear it, my dear sister,
And keep within the rear of your affection
Out of the shot and danger of desire.

He had compared Hamlet's regard for her to a spring violet, "forward, not permanent, sweet, not lasting, the perfume and suppliance of a minute." When he meets her again on his return home, the distracted girl, amidst her mad and obscure sayings, is reminded of violets by the presence of Laertes.

Thought and affliction, passion, hell itself,
She turns to favour and to prettiness.

And Ophelia carries this humour to her death, the manner of which is mournfully described in the lines we have quoted, and to which the Artist has supplied, in this drawing, a beautiful and appropriate illustration.

"A DANGEROUS HUG."

The scene of this perilous hunting adventure is in the mountains of the Hindoo Koosh, the western extension of the Himalayas, dividing the Cabul valley, with Chitral and Kafiristan, from the Kunduz and Badakshan provinces north-east of Afghanistan. The upper recesses of this range are haunted by two species of bears, and by wolves, leopards, and lions of a small type, with the wild cat of the Angora species, but are not very often visited by English sportsmen. None of these animals, when encountered in that region, are more formidable than the larger bear, whose mighty "hug," if he once gets hold of a man, leaves but one chance of escape—a timely shot from a ready comrade. This is the situation delineated in our Artist's drawing, which has been engraved for our Extra Supplement, and which tells its own tale, so far as it goes, though we are left in anxiety for the fate of the man writhing in the clutches of that powerful beast.

The annual returns of the Volunteer Corps of Great Britain shows that on Nov. 1 last the total enrolled strength of the force was 215,015, the authorised establishment being 249,419. Of the total enrolled strength, 208,365 are returned as efficients.

THE BECHUANALAND EXPEDITION.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Julius M. Price, a volunteer in "Methuen's Horse," part of the South African Field Force commanded by Major-General Sir Charles Warren, the Special Commissioner sent to restore order in Stellaland and Goshen, and to settle the land claims between the Boers and the Bechuana tribal chiefs, supplies further Sketches of the incidents of their life in camp and on the march. He was with the escort party accompanying the Telegraph Section of the Royal Engineers in advance of head-quarters; and one of his Sketches represent these on the march, with their mule-carts and waggons; another, the operation of laying a telegraph wire over the side of a rocky gorge, performed by the same "pioneers of civilisation." In the first-mentioned Sketch the men of the escort do not appear, as they are marching about three hundred yards in front; the conductor or guide, riding a Basuto pony, is a man roughly dressed, wearing a slouched felt hat, and with a big bushy beard. The front vehicle, a "Scotch cart," drawn by four mules, has two Kaffir drivers, one holding the reins, the other using the whip; two soldiers, with white helmets, are seated behind. The other vehicles are "buck waggons," with big teams of mules; sometimes as many as twelve are put in a team, and are driven, with much shrieking and cursing, by the aid of whips about 15 ft. long, which the drivers apply without sparing, as there is no "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals" in that part of South Africa. Regimental transport carts are seen between the waggons. In the other Sketch already mentioned, a signaller on horseback, with his flag, is at the top of the rocky bank; in the foreground below, two men are fixing the pole with stones, and two others, halfway up, are holding the telegraph wire, a coil of which lies on the ground. The sergeant in charge, with his hands behind his back holding a field-glass, is looking on at their work.

The scenes on the march to Barkly Camp, in West Griqualand, also furnish matter for our Illustrations. Here is the tent of a friendly Boer, at Boschman's Pan, with the owner seated at the door, a wealthy man, possessing large herds of cattle and flocks of sheep, besides the pig basking in the foreground. To the left, beyond the small tree, is a low pile of turf or stones, which is the fire-place or kitchen of the solitary household; there is also a pond or well, and a tub. Very different is the commissariat victualling department for the military at Barkly Camp; the seeming rampart, with a sentinel on the top, is built up of nearly two thousand cases, each containing six two-pound tins of corned beef for the daily food of the troops, which our Artist has entitled "Grub." The last of his Sketches here to be noticed was taken at "Stuurman's Kuill," and represents Sir Charles Warren's travelling-carriage, drawn by ten mules, with the native coachman wielding a whip of immense length; to the right are some of the tents occupied by the General's Staff. We observe, by the latest news, that Sir Charles Warren has approached Rooi Grond, on the frontier of the Transvaal at Goshen, which may probably be the farthest point that the expedition will have to visit; and it may be hoped that there is no opposition to his authority in that quarter.

THE LINCOLN MEETING.

The flat-racing season has begun in earnest. On Monday, the opening day of the Lincoln Meeting, Mr. R. C. Naylor won the Trial Stakes with Forethought; Mr. L. De Rothschild, the Tathwell Plate with Chartreuse; Mr. P. M. V. Saurin, the Grand National Hunt Steeplechase with Lady Tempest; Mr. Sadler, the Northern Welter Plate with Incendiary; Mr. G. F. Lee, the Northern Selling Plate with Tibicen; and Mr. R. Carington, the Batthyany Stakes with Bedouin. Lord Yarborough's Cumbalu walked over for the Gone Away Plate.

On the second day, Mr. Eastern won the Brocklesby Trial Plate with Sulphur; Mr. Craven, the Sudbrooke Selling Plate with Rape of the Lock; Mr. J. Hammond, the Doddington Plate with Strathblane; Mr. T. Jennings, the Castle Selling Plate with Melita; Mr. R. Peck, the Brocklesby Stakes with The Bard; Mr. P. M. V. Saurin, the Grand National Open Farmers' Plate with Lady Tempest; and Mr. R. Vyner, the Blankney Stakes with Stone Clink.

The Lincolnshire Handicap itself was reserved for Wednesday, when sport commenced with a victory for Mr. C. Blanton, who secured the Lincoln Cup with Assignation; the Mile Selling Plate fell to Naaman; and the Grand National Hunter's to Northampton. But the chief interest centred in the Lincolnshire Handicap, won by Bendigo, Bird of Freedom second, and MacMahon third.

Thursday saw an exodus from Lincoln to Liverpool.

Mr. Harrington, M.P., received last Saturday a draught for £2000, forwarded from the Irish National League in America for "Parliamentary purposes."

The arrivals of live stock and fresh meat at the port of Liverpool during the past week from the United States and Canada amounted to 2378 cattle, 211 sheep, 8507 quarters of fresh beef, and 1105 carcases of mutton.

"Beeton's Dictionary of Universal Information," published by Ward, Lock, and Co., is a compendium of all that relates to theoretical and applied science, natural history, commerce, literature, and all the needs and activities of modern life. A new edition of this most useful work has just been issued, enlarged and corrected to date by Mr. George R. Emerson.

"Mr. Hall Caine has written a fine story. Ralph Ray is a strong and a beautiful figure. The character of the heroine, too, is delicate and charming. . . . In this art [of the story-teller] Mr Caine shows himself to be an adept. The story, indeed, is picturesque, and unusually full of incidents of a striking and novel kind. It is, moreover, full of that true local colour which can only come from local knowledge. Altogether, the characteristics of the story are freshness of incident and originality of treatment."—Athenæum.

LOUIS VELVETEEN.

"LE FOLLET" says:—The LOUIS VELVETEEN has already rejoiced in a longer reign in the world of fashion than that of any material within our recollection; and when we take into consideration that it is equally suitable for all occasions—an advantage no other fabric possesses—and that, whether employed as a complete dress, portions of toilettes, or trimmings, it is as effective as it is serviceable, its favour is not surprising.

The Louis Velveteen, from its wonderful resemblance to the richest Silk Velvet, is essentially a lady's material; the lights and shadows, so thoroughly like those of Genoa and Lyons Velvet, the rich folds and graceful drapery, so soft and silky to the touch, all account easily for its great and permanent vogue among the aristocracy, both here and abroad.

Though very strong, it is so light in wear that even in elaborately made dresses, with long trains, it has no inconvenient weight; while from some peculiar and special arrangement of the pile, no amount of creasing will flatten or rub it; neither rain nor dust alter its rich colourings or dim the bloom for which it is so celebrated—advantages that cannot be too highly appreciated.

EVERY YARD of the GENUINE BEARS THE NAME

CRÊPE IMPÉRIAL, for Mourning Wear.
It is all wool, and yet looks exactly like crepe, as it has the crinkled or crimped surface which is inseparable from that fabric. It is solid and most durable, being free from the elasticity of the more perishable silk crêpe, which it so closely resembles, and yet it is glossy. It is made up effectively into costumes for deep mourning, when it is not compulsory to trim with crêpe, and will wear as long as the mourner elects to use it.—Extract from "The Queen, the Lady's Newspaper."

CHAPTER XIX.

GEORGINA.

Clare's modest aspiration for a little company was gratified in an unexpected manner by the sudden appearance upon the scene of Adrian's sister. It was Miss Vidal's habit to arrive from remote quarters of the globe during the progress of the London season; for she combined a taste for savage life with a genuine appreciation of humanity in its higher phases of development; and, indeed, at the bottom of her heart she agreed with Lady St. Austell that there was no place in the world like the capital of her native land. She was shown into Clare's drawing-room one afternoon when Adrian was out, and introduced herself, remarking as tranquilly as if she had just come up from the country, instead of from the South Seas: "I shall only be in town for a few weeks, so I thought I wouldn't lose time in calling upon you."

Clare looked at this tall, fair haired, and rather handsome woman, who had a pair of frank, good-humoured eyes, and took a fancy to her at once. In face she was not unlike her brother, whose senior she was by a year or two; but her manner was her own, and, in spite of a certain abruptness, it was not an unpleasant manner.

"I have heard all about you from my mother," she said; "so I feel that you are not quite a stranger. My mother's report was very complimentary, which is more than can be said for most of her reports. By-the-by, did she tell you anything about me? I hope not."

Clare took a second look at Miss Vidal, who was seated opposite to her, with her hands upon her knees and her elbows squared out. The attitude was perhaps a slightly masculine one, and the speaker had the appearance of being accustomed to use her limbs more freely than women generally do; but there was nothing unconventional about her attire. Her dress was well cut and fitted her neat figure perfectly, her boots and gloves were all that they ought to be, and she had a parasol with a long handle, just like everybody else. Remembering quite well the picture drawn by Mrs. Vidal of her daughter, Clare smiled and only replied: "She told me you were in the South Sea Islands."

"Nothing more than that? Are you sure she didn't tell you that I had become a convert to cannibalism? The year before last, when I came back from Africa, I was asked by half a dozen people whether it was true that I had shot a native chief and taken command of his tribe; and when I inquired where they got their information from, they all with one consent replied, 'From your mother.' I call that rather hard. However, as she often tells me, one can't conceal one's self in the wilds for months together and then expect that no strange assertions will be made about one's proceedings. She herself can't make out why I go to such places, or what I do when I am there; but she has a general impression that I am up to no good. This time I am going to stop the mouth of calumny by publishing a book full of interesting information, which I am afraid you will have to read."

Clare said, politely, that she was sure she would enjoy reading it.

"I don't feel quite so confident about that: other people's travels always strike me as so extraordinarily wearisome. But there are tiresome duties connected with every position, and domestic criticism appears to be one of yours. It is rather bad luck for you to have to encourage an illiterate sister-in-law as well as a literary husband. Does Adrian make you read all his novels in manuscript?"

"He doesn't make me; he allows me to read them," answered Clare.

Miss Vidal laughed. "I apologise. It's a privilege, of course. I don't know what you will think of me when I confess that I haven't seen either of his books yet. My only excuse is that it takes some time for recent works to reach Otaheite."

"Do you really like going to such far-away countries all by yourself?" asked Clare.

"Yes, I think I do. Upon the whole, I like it much better than I expected that I should. I don't know that I have any very great natural love of adventure; but when it is a choice between Brighton and barbarism, one can't hesitate. One gets a little tired of wandering about the earth's surface; but, things being as they are, I suppose I shall continue to do so till the end of the chapter."

"I hope not," said Clare, to whom this seemed a dismal prospect. "You may have a home of your own some day."

"I may marry, you mean? Well, I may; but it isn't very likely. Whenever I have contemplated anything of the kind I have found myself confronted by a dilemma from which there is no escape. I shouldn't like a husband who made me obey him, and I should rather despise a husband who obeyed me. Therefore, I remain unfettered."

"And where are you staying now?"

"Oh, in lodgings. It isn't quite the thing, I know. One is allowed to dispense with a chaperon in the southern hemisphere, but not in London. Still, I must see my friends occasionally; and, as my mother declares that she can't afford three weeks in town, I have to defy public opinion and come up alone."

"But why did you not come to us?" asked Clare. "Was it because we live in such an out-of-the-way quarter?"

Miss Vidal looked half pleased and half amused. "You are very kind," she said, "and I don't call South Kensington at all out of the way. But, barbarian though I am, I don't make a practice of inviting myself to stay with people who have never asked me."

"Not even with your brother?" exclaimed Clare. "Why, if one of the boys came up to London I should expect him here as a matter of course; and if I were unmarried and had a married brother I should think I was paying him a very poor compliment by taking lodgings when he had a spare room to give me. You don't know what a kindness you would do me if you would make this house your head-quarters as long as it suits you. Adrian is obliged to be a great deal away, and lately I have often wished for somebody to talk to while he is out. Of course, though, if you do consent to move here, I shall not expect you to sit with me all day long. You will come and go exactly as you please, and nobody will ask you to do anything that you don't feel inclined to do. Please think it over."

Miss Vidal, as in duty bound, resisted for a time; but her resistance was not very strenuous, and while she was allowing her scruples to be removed, one by one, Adrian came in and settled the matter by adding his entreaties to Clare's. He was fond of his sister, and, being for his own part honestly glad to see her again, he rejoiced to find that his wife was amiably disposed towards her.

"You may as well yield gracefully, Georgie," he said. "You can't pretend that you prefer poky lodgings to this palatial residence, or your own society to ours. We have just been entertaining Clare's mother, and it's only fair that my side of the family should have a turn now."

So Miss Vidal became a temporary inmate of the little house in Alexandra-gardens, and did a good deal towards rendering it more cheerful for one of its occupants. It is not always that sisters-in-law hit it off together; but these two speedily became friends—perhaps because each found in the other the qualities which were wanting in herself. The elder of them was one of those happy persons who, being blessed with a perfectly healthy organisation, do not know what it is to be weary or bored, and who consequently very seldom bore their neighbours. There was a brisk good humour about her and a determination to make the best of everything which were as good as a tonic to her younger companion, who had gradually fallen into a condition of languor for which her late illness was hardly sufficient to account. Miss Vidal had little personal knowledge of sentimental troubles; but she had sharp eyes, and it is probable that she formed a pretty shrewd guess at the nature of a complaint which did not admit of verbal consolation.

There is not much to be said to those who persist in mourning for the dead, and there is still less to be said to the foolish people who won't understand that courtship and marriage are two distinct things. A little oblivion is the remedy which most commonly suggests itself to bystanders; and it may be that Clare, who did not know what was the matter with her, and had no suspicion that she was being put through a course of treatment, may have been unconsciously benefited in this way by being dragged about to concert-rooms, exhibitions, and other places of amusement. "You must remember that I am a country-cousin," the indefatigable Georgina would say; "and I want to be shown the sights."

She had, apparently, a large number of friends, who met her, either by accident or appointment, at picture-galleries and elsewhere, and who walked about with her while her sister-in-law rested. In one of these Clare was especially interested—not so much on account of his physical or mental attributes, neither of which were of a striking order, as by reason of the obvious and profound admiration which he entertained for Miss Vidal. Georgina introduced him to her casually, one day, as "My friend Mr. De Wynt. Mr. De Wynt is a clerk in the Treasury, and has no peculiarities of any sort or kind."

This description of himself did not seem to be resented by the subject of it, who was a dapper little man of something over thirty, with fair hair, very smoothly brushed, and a carefully trimmed beard.

"Some of us can't afford to be peculiar," he remarked, placidly. "Miss Vidal, of course, can; but if I were to set up for being original, I should lose all my friends at once. I mean to say, they simply wouldn't stand it, you know. Ask any one of my acquaintances whether he knows me, and I can tell you exactly what his answer will be. He will smile and say, 'De Wynt? Oh, yes; I know him. He isn't a bad little chap.' But supposing that I attempted to strike out a line of my own, what would be the result? Why, that I should be known as 'that thundering little idiot De Wynt.' And I would rather not be spoken of in that way."

"He plays the piano," observed Georgina," as if thinking it only fair that her friend should be credited with any little claim to distinction that he might possess.

"Well, yes; I play the piano; but I trust that there is nothing very peculiar in that. My playing is bad, certainly, still not so bad as to be phenomenal."

"His playing is really rather good," Miss Vidal said. "You can come and see us some afternoon, Mr. De Wynt, if you like, and bring your music with you under your arm. Do you mind carrying a roll of music through the streets?"

"I don't like it," answered De Wynt; "it makes one look so like a singing-master, don't you know. But I'll come in a hansom, if Mrs. Vidal will allow me to call upon her."

He redeemed his promise within a few days, and was received with much cordiality by Clare, who had made up her mind that this sensible little gentleman would make the best husband in the world for her sister-in-law. His behaviour on this and on subsequent occasions left no room for doubt as to the fact of his attachment to Miss Vidal, whom he adored silently and placidly, and who treated him with a good-humoured imperiousness, to which he did not appear to object. He was very glad to do her errands, to look after her when she wanted an escort, and to make himself generally useful; and if he did not demean himself in all respects like a lover, it was Clare's opinion that he was only restrained from doing so by fear of the lady whom he loved.

She said as much, one day, to Georgina, who either was, or affected to be, greatly amused by this assertion, and exclaimed, "Poor Mr. De Wynt! he little suspects that he has been decoyed into the house of a match-maker. I hope you won't be so unkind as to deprive me of his services by saying anything of this sort to him. If you do, he will take to his heels at once; for he has considerable expectations, I believe, and is altogether rather an eligible little person in his way. It wouldn't suit him at all to be mated with a strong-minded female of eccentric habits."

"You know perfectly well that he is devoted to you," returned Clare," and I believe you like him too. Some day, when you are tired of roaming about the world, you will be sorry for having snubbed a man who asks for nothing better than to make you happy."

But Miss Vidal shook her head. "I told you before," said she, "that I shouldn't like either to be a slave or a slave-owner. I never snub Mr. De Wynt, whom I think a most amiable and estimable being; but I have received no offer from him, and if I had I shouldn't have accepted it—as people say when they haven't been asked to a party. And, talking of that, have you made up your mind to accept Lady St. Austell's invitation?"

This change of subject had the effect, which it was probably designed to have, of diverting Clare's thoughts into another channel. The invitation alluded to had reached her that morning, and had brought about a discussion across the breakfast-table between her and her husband, which, though brief, had not been altogether pleasant.

Lord St. Austell possessed, on the banks of the Thames, near Richmond, a small house with large grounds attached to it, where his wife was in the habit of holding an annual grand party. It was by no means everybody who received a card for these functions, at which Royalty was always largely represented, and upon which the giver spared neither trouble nor money. Lady St. Austell was exclusive once a year upon much the same principle as causes proprietors of private roads to close their gates for a few hours at stated intervals. She thought it incumbent upon her to make an occasional public assertion of the position in society that she was entitled to claim; after having done which she would return to the easy-going habits that were more congenial to her nature. Now, Adrian had not felt at all sure that he would be included among the distinguished guests bidden to Richmond, and in proportion to his pleasure at being thus honoured was his annoyance when his wife expressed a decided wish to send a refusal. Understanding, as of course he did, what was Clare's reason for disliking to partake of any hospitality in that quarter, he could not repress a gesture of impatience as he said:

"There is no need to send any answer at all. Perhaps, when the time comes, you may want to go. I shall be sorry if you don't, because Lady St. Austell has gone out of her way to be civil to us more than once, and if she notices our absence she will most likely think that it isn't worth her while to trouble herself about us any more."

Such an eventuality would not have grieved Clare; but she felt that she had no right to bring it about. She had been too proud to question Adrian as to his visits to Grosvenor-square; but she had not been too proud to put together certain scraps of circumstantial evidence which convinced her that they had been resumed; nor, unfortunately, had she sufficient self-command to abstain from such futile indications as this of her distrust of the woman whom she regarded as his would-be beguiler. After having needlessly vexed him by entering her protest, she began to feel qualms of conscience and prepared to yield. Some pressure was brought to bear upon her by Miss Vidal, who knew of no just cause or impediment why advantage should not be taken of Lady St. Austell's politeness; and this provided her with a sort of excuse for surrender.

"I have decided to go to that garden party, after all; Georgina would like to see it," she said afterwards to Adrian, who accepted the explanation without comment, his one wish being to avoid all mention of a subject which seemed likely to lead to unpleasantness.

If Clare's self-sacrifice won her no thanks from her husband, it met with grateful recognition from De Wynt, who had hardly anticipated that the ladies in whose company he had latterly spent all his spare time would be present at the Richmond gathering, nor indeed (if the truth must be told) that they would be asked to be present. He knew that Clare was not fond of society, and he also knew that Lady St. Austell made it a rule to ask no one who was not in society to this especial entertainment. He himself had received an invitation as a matter of course, because he always did receive invitations to everything that was going, and there were very few notices of parties recorded in the papers that chronicle such events in which the list of guests did not terminate with "Mr. De Wynt, &c." To what he owed so much honour it would be difficult to say exactly. Possibly, as he was himself wont to aver, to his unobtrusiveness.

"It's awfully good of you to go to this thing, Mrs. Vidal," he said. "You won't enjoy yourself; but you will give enjoyment to other people, and that is your notion of happiness, I know."

In truth, Mr. De Wynt had formed an exalted idea of Clare's character, which he did not disguise.

"Georgina will enjoy it, I hope," she answered, with a smile.

"I was thinking of myself, I confess; but perhaps she may enjoy it too. I am not sure whether she cares much about meeting Royalties and Duchesses."

"I fancy that perhaps she is a little above caring to meet people who have nothing beyond a title to recommend them," observed Clare, who wanted to represent her sister-in-law in as flattering colours as possible.

"Well, you know, I think that's rather a pity," said the little man. "It's all very well to be unconventional; but it seems to me that if one doesn't allow that rank carries a certain distinction with it, one might as well be a Republican at once; and we're not Republicans in England yet, don't you know. Of course, there are plenty of yeomen and any number of country gentlemen who could show longer pedigrees than some of the people who lead society nowadays—and then there's the aristocracy of talent, and all that. But it's a mistake to turn up one's nose at these people, who think themselves our superiors, and to pretend that one doesn't want to be asked to their houses. At least, I think it is; but then I suppose I am rather a snob in some ways," he added, reflectively.

Clare had no difficulty in reading between the lines of this harangue. Mr. De Wynt was, above all things a prudent man; and, in spite of his admiration for Miss Vidal, he was probably quite alive to the disadvantages of having an eccentric wife. It was not, however, very likely that Georgina's eccentricity would take the democratic form which he deprecated; nor, so far as Clare could judge, was he likely to be deterred from offering her his hand and heart by anything except a sense of his own unworthiness. She had scarcely any doubt but that this couple would come to an understanding sooner or later, little though they seemed disposed to hurry themselves over it. It amused her to watch them together; and she had ample leisure for watching them and others at Lady St. Austell's garden party, for nobody took much notice of her there.

Her husband found her a seat on the sloping lawn, whence, as he said, she could "survey the show"; and she sat and surveyed the show accordingly, being very well satisfied to take that passive part in the proceedings. The scene was certainly the most effective that she had witnessed in her brief experience of London society. Under the shade of cedars and copper beeches, and among flower-beds blazing with scarlet and blue and a hundred other tints, were congregated some of the prettiest and best dressed women in England; the river, like a broad band of silver, made a background for all this colour, and the sunny, hazy atmosphere softened down what was too crude in it. Lady St. Austell was standing at the entrance of a marquee, surrounded by exalted personages, while in the shadow behind her hovered her lord, an indistinct figure, all teeth and eye-glass. Georgina and De Wynt were pacing up and down one of the paths, the latter taking off his hat at every other step and evidently rejoicing in the recognitions accorded to him. Adrian, who was flitting about from group to group, appeared to be in the full enjoyment of the same innocent pleasure.

Upon all this Clare looked down with an odd sensation of being out of it, of being set aside, of having neither part nor lot in the existence which her husband found so charming. Every now and then, someone, whose face she vaguely remembered to have seen in the far-away time before her illness, bowed and passed on; one or two people stopped to shake hands with her: but, as she could think of nothing to say, to them, they did not linger long beside her. No doubt it was her own fault if she was isolated; but that did not prevent her isolation from becoming a little depressing in the long run, and the unexpected appearance of an old friend among all those strangers brought a flush of pleasure into her cheeks, and caused her to start up impulsively from her chair to meet him.

"You back in England, Mr. Heriot!" she exclaimed; "and you have never been to see us!"

"I only returned the day before yesterday," answered Heriot, into whose sallow face a slight accession of colour had also found its way, "and I should have called upon you to-day if Lady St. Austell hadn't told me that I should meet you here."

"You went to see Lady St. Austell first, then!" cried Clare, petulantly. "What is there in Lady St. Austell that fascinates you all so much? Are you, too, among her adorers?"

The moment that she had uttered this somewhat injudicious speech she would have been glad to recall it; but Heriot was discreet enough to let it pass. He began to talk about other things—about his own travels during the winter, about Adrian's successes, and about Cornwall, which last theme was always a welcome one to Clare. Her eyes brightened as she said: "We are going home—to Cardrew, I mean—early in August, and if you want to be charitable, you will come and stay a long time, and keep Adrian from being bored. This year we shall have plenty of room, because Bob is away on the East Indian station, poor fellow, and Jack is going to Norway to fish. We shall miss them both a good deal; still we shall be a tolerably large party without them, and it will be like old times again, I hope. You will be sure to come, won't you?"

"Well, perhaps I will, if I'm asked," answered Heriot. "And how do you like the gay world now? When I saw you last, you told me that you were dying to make acquaintance with it. Do you remember?"

"Yes;—it seems a long time ago," sighed Clare. "So much has happened since then."

Heriot made a sort of sympathetic murmur. He took it for granted that she was alluding to the loss of her baby, and was not sure whether outspoken condolence with regard to such a subject would be considered in very good taste. But in truth it was not of that only that Clare was thinking.

"Do you know," she went on, "I don't like the gay world at all. I am not fitted for it, and—and it isn't exactly what I thought it would be. Lately I have not been able to go out much myself; but Adrian does. Sometimes I almost wish"——

She did not finish her sentence; but the blank was easy enough to fill up. Heriot quite understood it all. What he had foreseen had evidently come to pass, and he was sorry for it; yet he did not think it advisable to encourage vain repinings. "I am glad you can persuade Adrian to go about without you," he said cheerfully. "Married men are far too apt to get into a lazy way of falling asleep after dinner and refusing to stir from their arm-chairs, when they ought to be gathering fresh ideas by mixing with their fellow-creatures. I grant you that historians and philosophers may shut themselves up without injuring the quality of their work very much; but a novelist can't see too many people."

"I dare say you are right," replied Clare, rather coldly. Mr. Heriot might have spared her that hint that she had no business to monopolise her husband, she thought. She had not meant to complain, and felt that she had been undeservedly snubbed. After this she fell back into silence and apathy, thereby causing her old friend to anathematise himself inwardly for having been such an ass as to interfere with what did not concern him.

"Now that you have successfully put your foot into it," thought he to himself, "the sooner you go away the better." And before very long an opportunity for withdrawing was afforded him by the approach of Lord St. Austell, who passed him with a nod and took a chair on Mrs. Vidal's left hand.

Lord St. Austell, set free by the departure of his Royal guests, had for the last quarter of an hour been prowling about the grounds, like a superannuated knight-errant in search of adventures, and had been pleased by the discovery of an extremely pretty face, which he indistinctly remembered to have seen somewhere before. Pretty faces were to him what the magnet is to iron, and having found, upon inquiry, that this one belonged to "Mrs. Vidal—wife of the man who writes the books, you know," he advanced towards Clare with a grin of satisfaction not unlike that with which an aged wolf may be supposed to contemplate a lamb. De Wynt, who noticed his proceedings, said to Georgina, "Look at old St. Austell making up to your sister-in-law. He must have thought of something very disagreeable to tell her, or he wouldn't be looking so pleased."

But Lord St. Austell, as he seated himself, said nothing more disagreeable than "Mrs. Vidal, I want to know who your dressmaker is."

"I don't think you would be much the wiser if I were to tell you," answered Clare, laughing. "She is not a fashionable dressmaker."

"She has managed to turn you out better than anyone else here, at all events," returned Lord St. Austell; not because he thought so, but because experience had led him to believe that no woman living doubts the sincerity of this particular form of flattery. "To be sure," he added, "she had an admirable subject to exercise her skill upon, and that counts for something. If I were a dressmaker, I should charge all the ugly women double prices."

"I am afraid they wouldn't employ you long upon those terms," remarked Clare.

"I shouldn't want them. I hate ugly women. I should devote myself to—well, to the ones who are like you; and I should never send in my bill unless I was sure that their husbands would discharge all claims without making a fuss. I hope you make yours pay up handsomely, by-the-way."

"I don't think I care much about dress," answered Clare, who felt that the old gentleman was becoming a little impertinent, but did not quite know how to set him down, "and my husband has not a superabundance of spare money. Why are you so anxious that he should spend it upon my clothes?"

"I should say that was the least he could do," returned Lord St. Austell, screwing his glass into his eye and leering up into his neighbour's face. "When husbands treat themselves to little diversions they must expect to pay for them in some shape or form; and yours ought to pay twice as much as another man, because he has such shocking bad taste. I yield to no man in my admiration for Lady St. Austell; but, at the same time—oh, no! I really can't compliment Mr. Vidal on his taste. If I had the good fortune to stand in his shoes, I think I should be very well contented to do my worshipping at home."

"I don't know what you mean," said Clare, in a somewhat tremulous voice.

By way of reply, Lord St. Austell pointed with his stick to the marquee, where her ladyship could be seen, reclining in an arm-chair and talking with much apparent animation to someone whose body was concealed by the side of the tent, but whose legs and feet were visible. "Your husband's legs," Lord St. Austell observed, explanatorily. "My dear Mrs. Vidal, we are both of us very badly used. Suppose we try to console each other?"

It was then that Clare distinguished herself in an unusual manner. "Thank you," said she, getting up; "but I should like you to believe that my taste is not quite so bad as my husband's."

She turned away without deigning to watch the effect of this tremendous retort, and, joining Georgina, suggested that it was time to go away. "Perhaps you will kindly look for Adrian, Mr. De Wynt," she said, not caring to show that she knew where her husband was.

It was with a heavy heart that Clare seated herself in the carriage which was to take her back to London. Things were going badly with her, she thought, and there was little ground for hope that they would ever go better. That Adrian no longer loved her in the old way was plain enough; otherwise he would hardly have made himself so conspicuous with Lady St. Austell as to attract the notice even of Lady St. Austell's husband. Very likely he saw no great harm in flirtation; Clare's small experience of the ways of modern society led her to believe that he was only acting as most other people acted. "Yet," she thought, with some bitterness, "he might have spared me to-day. He knew that I only went to Richmond to please him; he knew that the whole thing was hateful to me; and, at least, he need not have devoted himself to that odious woman before my very eyes."

Of one thing, however, she was quite determined: she would not interfere with him again. She had made her protest, and had made it vainly: it would be useless as well as undignified to repeat it. Nor would she vex him any more by seeming annoyed at his behaviour. Neither by word nor look would she betray the pain that he was inflicting upon her. What would be the good?

She chewed the cud of these reflections and formed the above heroic resolution, sitting, grave and silent, in the carriage, while Adrian and Georgina chatted about the party which they had just left; and so successful was she in carrying out her intention that both her companions saw clearly that she was displeased, while one of them understood perfectly well the cause of her displeasure.

Adrian sighed impatiently once or twice. He was ready to make allowances for Clare (for what is the use of adopting the study of character as a profession if one does not learn from it to be lenient to the failings of others?), but it seemed to him that if he yielded to every fancy of hers, his life would very soon cease to be worth having. What could be more absurd than that she should be angry with him because he had talked for a quarter of an hour to his hostess at a garden party? While they had been taking leave of Lady St. Austell, he had noticed Clare's freezing demeanour and Lord St. Austell's sardonic grin, and had felt that he was being made ridiculous. He fully expected to be called to account for his conduct as soon as he reached home, and to be called to account for sins which one has not committed is only less disagreeable than being called to account for those which one has. When his anticipations in this respect were falsified, he was thankful, and asked no questions, as perhaps Clare secretly hoped that he might do. He said to himself that he detested scenes, and wouldn't provoke one. Possibly, it might have been better to have a scene and a reconciliation than to allow his wife to hold him at arm's length; but he doubted whether any reconciliation could be effected at this time without concessions which he was not prepared to offer; so, although her coldness made him unhappy, he did not attempt to break it down, but only threw himself with redoubled energy into the work and play with which every hour of his day was easily filled.

Estrangements usually begin when quarrels end, since quarrels are such unpleasant things that few care to pick them with those whom they do not love; but Vidal and his wife became estranged now less from indifference than from a certain lack of moral courage on both sides. If one of them was more to blame than the other, it was probably Clare, who ought to have trusted her husband until she had clear proof that he was undeserving of trust. She was also by far the more miserable of the two, having little to do but to brood over her troubles, whereas Adrian was busy from morning to night. The latter had been in the habit, ever since he had reached years of discretion, of seeking sympathy and counsel from Heriot, and he would not have departed from this custom in his present strait, had he not been deterred by a presentiment that Heriot would declare him to be in the wrong. Now, there is no sort of comfort to be got out of the advice of those who won't take your side; and Vidal knew this so well that he gave Brook-street a wide berth, thereby making it quite plain to his friend that something was wrong.

SOME SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

If any distinguished man of the eighteenth century—a Burke, or a Johnson, for example—could return to earth in these closing years of the nineteenth, it would be interesting to learn what he thought of modern society, and what changes struck him most forcibly. No doubt his earliest attention would be drawn to material changes. Place him in London, and he will find the great city he loved so well in its darkness illumined with the electric light and gas. Looking up, he will see an intricate mesh-work of wires; looking about him, he will read announcements which fail to convey a meaning. Railroads, steamers, and steam-engines, telephones, telegraphs, photographs: here are things new and strange indeed. The look of the streets is changed; the face of the country is altered; bricks have covered the lanes, woods, and fields with which he was once familiar, and the rural silence, and pleasant country sounds still sweeter than silence, of suburban London are exchanged for the shrieks of engines and the shrill music of news-boys. Only here and there will he be able to recognise spots once familiar and dear, and thus to hold a link or two binding the present and the past. The more he sees and hears, the more perplexed would this representative of a former age become. Many of the common words in use, even "Dictionary Johnson" will fail to understand; and his intellect, powerful though it be, will at first fail to grasp the purposes of science.

In other ways, he will discover that the world to which he has returned is a new one, with a different social atmosphere and a fresh political basis. Outwardly, there is more activity and more intensity; more earnestness about great subjects; more of plain speaking; and more, if not of personal charity, yet of the benevolence that acts through associations. It is a significant fact that almost all the great religious and philanthropic societies which distinguish this age were born in the age. And just as there have been great discoveries in science, so it may be said there have been discoveries in charity and mercy. In the eighteenth century the laws were cruel, and the punishment was often more hateful than the crime. Heads were fixed upon Temple Bar and left to rot there; children were carried to Tyburn by the cartload; our prisons were sinks of vice and fever, and prisoners, when brought into court, have been known to infect with jail fever the Judge upon the bench. Great and good men like Burke and Johnson were conscious, in their own sphere, of many evils, and sought to remedy them; but the aggressive and corporate action of our day was a thing unknown. And the men and women who constituted what was then called "the town" were perfectly content to let the world wag without troubling their heads about it. We have a fuller life than our forefathers had, but also one far more anxious and perplexing. What, indeed, with some symbolic exaggeration, is dynamite itself but an outward and visible sign of our inward troubles? The energy of modern thought and action is tremendous, and more than once within living memory it has proved itself deadly and explosive.

Take another sign of the times. Knowledge covers a wider surface in our century than in any previous era. And the extensive diffusion of information has produced a large class of men and women whose minds are simply the receptacles of opinions and facts. They are like bottles which hold what is poured into them. They feed on the brains of others without exercising their own; they think—if thinking it can be called—by proxy; they gain a smattering of many things, and understand nothing thoroughly. This is the age of periodicals. What subject is there in this wide world, or beyond it, that cannot be discussed and dismissed in a lazy, after-dinner hour? what political question which, thanks to one's favourite newspaper, cannot be mastered in a half-hour's railway journey? A passive condition of mind like this accepts what is placed before it, and is liable to be swayed by every charlatan in journalism or demagogue on the platform. It is probably a moderate calculation to say that there are twenty readers to one thinker; and, of course, a multiplication of books and magazines does not involve a corresponding increase of wisdom.

Another and better sign of the times may be noticed in conclusion. More than ever is the truth becoming recognised that the whole world is one family; and this fellow-feeling grows daily stronger, in spite of the forces that are antagonistic to it. Europe is armed to the teeth; the preparations for war were never more perfect; society has also its secret enemies, as England knows but too well: yet no one who looks below the surface will doubt that the love of fighting for the glory of it, which inspired the career of the first Napoleon, is growing weaker every day; that killing as a trade, a flourishing trade in former ages, has lost its ancient repute, and that men are everywhere recognising the truth asserted by Milton that > Peace hath her victories, no less renowned than war.

Indeed, we go beyond Milton nowadays, and assert that her victories are far more renowned than the most famous of military triumphs.

The Board of Trade have awarded a binocular glass to Captain Felix José De Souza, of the Brazilian coasting-vessel Nova Alliança, of Una, in acknowledgment of his humanity and kindness to the shipwrecked crew of the British ship Fluellin, of London, which took fire at sea and was abandoned off the coast of Brazil on Dec. 24, 1884.

A special banquet was given at the Freemasons' Tavern on the 19th inst., to celebrate the coming-of-age of the Homes for Little Boys. Mr. George Hanbury presided, and several speakers testified to the useful work carried on in the institutions at Swanley and Farningham. The subscriptions amounted to £1700.

SOLUTION OF PROBLEM No. 2137.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Kt to Q B 4th	K to Q 4th
2. B to K 8th	Any move
3. Mates accordingly.

NOTE.—If Black play 1. K to Q 2nd, White continues with 2. Q to Q Kt 6th; if 1. K to K 2nd, then 2. Q to Q 2nd, mating in each case on the third move.

PROBLEM No. 2140.
By H. W. SHEPPARD.
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play, and mate in three moves.

Another of the ten games played sans voir and simultaneously by Mr. BLACKBURNE, in Melbourne. Here the English champion is opposed by Mr HAMEL. The notes are by Mr. Burns.

(Scotch Gambit.)

WHITE (Mr. B.)	BLACK (Mr H.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
3. P to Q 4th	P takes P
4. B to Q B 4th	P to K B 3rd

This move, made with the idea of confusing the blindfold player, is probably the worst on the board, and gives Black a lost game at the outset.

5. P to Q B 3rd	Kt to R 4th

Also very bad; losing time first in getting the Kt out of play, and afterwards in attempting to get it into play.

6. B takes Kt	R takes B
7. Kt takes P	P to K Kt 3rd
8. P to K B 4th	P to Q 3rd
9. Castles

He might also have played 9. Q to R 4th (ch) with great effect.

9.	B to Q 2nd
10. Kt to R 3rd	P to Q R 3rd

10. B to R 3rd is far better; the move made not only loses valuable time, but invites the attack of the Pawns on the Queen's side after he has castled.

11. Q Kt to B 2nd	Q to K 2nd
12. Q to B 3rd	Castles
13. Kt to K 3rd	Kt to B 3rd
14. Kt to Q 5th	Q to Kt 2nd
15. B to K 3rd	Kt to K 2nd
16. P to Q Kt 4th	K to Kt sq

Black's game is hopelessly compromised, but surely 16. P to B 3rd is better than this purposeless move.

17. P to Q R 4th	Kt to Q B sq
18. P to Kt 5th

White takes full advantage of his opportunities, and soon obtains a crushing attack.

18.	P to Q R 4th
19. Q R to Kt sq	P to K R 4th
20. Kt to Q B 6th (ch)	B takes Kt
21. P takes B	P to Kt 3rd
22. B takes P	Kt takes B
23. Kt takes Kt, and Black resigned.

We are pleased to learn that the Right Hon. the Earl of Dartrey, K.P., has become a member of the proposed Irish Chess Association, and has liberally subscribed to its funds.

A match between the Railway Clearing House and the London and Westminster Bank Clubs was played on the 11th inst. The representatives of the first-named institution won by six games to one and one forfeited.

The following is the problem which gained the second prize in the Copenhagen tourney. It is the composition of Mr. Edward Walter, of Neuhaus, Bohmen.

Black: K at Q B 5th, R at Q 4th, B at K Kt sq, Kt at K B 2nd; Pawns at K Kt 6th, K 7th, Q B 2nd and 3rd. (Eight pieces.)

White to play, and mate in three moves.

The detailed distribution of the forces to be assembled on Brighton Downs on Easter Monday, under the command of General Sir G. H. S. Willis, shows a total force of nearly 19,000 of all arms, divided into three divisions of seven brigades, with thirty guns, supplied principally from the Metropolis.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon has intimated to his tenants on the Goodwood estate that, in consequence of the prevalent depression in agriculture, he has decided to make an abatement of 10 per cent in their rents for the next three years, commencing with the last year's rent, due at Lady Day. The concession is made equally to those who hold their farms under lease and to those who hold under yearly agreements.—The Rev. Sir Brook G. Bridges, Bart., has granted his Kentish tenants a reduction of from 20 to 25 per cent in their rents for the last six months.

Lord Napier of Magdala presided yesterday week at the meeting of the Royal United Service Institution, when a paper was read by Sir George W. Green on the organisation and employment of Camel Corps in warfare. After giving a sketch of the organisation of the old Sonde Camel Corps, he explained his ideas on the proper mode of utilising a camel corps, which should be under well-armed attendants, and should also convey both them and soldiers or baggage. Lord Napier of Magdala, in moving a vote of thanks to Sir G. Green, said he well remembered him coming up with his regiment of Punjaubees to the relief of Lucknow, and how admirably he and his regiment had behaved.

NEW BOOKS.

George Borrow is mentioned in Our Gipsies: by Vernon S. Morwood (Sampson Low and Co.): but the author of the book—which has about a score of more or less excellent and interesting illustrations, and is altogether a fine, handsome volume—is under the impression that though "gipsies have lived in England nearly four hundred years, yet comparatively little is known either of their origin, character, or general life." It is not worth while to argue the question; it is more to the purpose to admit that the author, whether his impression be right or wrong, compiled his work (for it is little more than a compilation) under the influence of the most praiseworthy motives, and has put together some very curious, very noteworthy, very amusing information. It is useless to inquire, as has so often been vainly inquired, how the gipsies came by the name which has clung to them from time immemorial in this country; but most competent readers will probably differ entirely from the author in his opinion that they acquired the appellation from their vulture-like propensities and practices. For, though the Greek word for vulture may be "gyps," which undergraduates at learned Universities might very well be expected to use for the designation of a rapacious servant, is it likely that a classical term would be applied to a race of people who, in the very nature of things, would be brought more into contact with ignorant rustics than with erudite scholars? Besides, the author discredits his own opinion by writing the word "gipsies," instead of "gypsies." However, all this matters not a straw. It is more important to remark that, according to the author, the gipsies with whom he has conversed—and he has conversed with not a few—cannot be induced to "admit that any tie of consanguinity connects them either with the Jews or the Gentiles." This alone would prove them to be a truly remarkable race of men, if at least they are aware that "Gentiles" is a term supposed to comprise all people but Jews. Perhaps the illustrious gipsies consider themselves to be like the heroes or demigods of the Greek mythology, not wholly human and yet not wholly divine; and they are certainly believed to show a similar ignorance or disregard of the difference between "meum" and "tuum," a similar disposition to "convey" another's property, whether in the form of a golden fleece, or a sheep or a lamb, for one of which a man may proverbially as well be hanged as the other. The book is made up, to a very considerable extent, of extracts taken from newspapers, periodicals, and various similar or dissimilar publications; but there is also a very appreciable intermixture of personal experience and knowledge obtained at first hand. As regards the author's method of proceeding with his work, it may suffice to state that he discourses, in order, of the gipsies as a separate and mysterious people, of their origin, of their migrations and persecutions, of their dialect, of their paronymics and what can hardly be called with universal correctness their Christian names, of singular incidents in their lives, of their tents, vans, and domestic arrangements, of their weddings, births, baptisms (when there are any), longevity, deaths, funerals, and epitaphs, of points on which they are in agreement and at variance with the Jews, of their pecuniary views and habits, of their vanity and their grand balls, of their mental powers, of their teachers and pupils, of their alleged vices and their virtues (such as hospitality and gratitude), of their revengeful spirit, of the animals they employ for work and keep as pets, of their religion, superstitions, dreams, and fortune-telling, of the claims they have upon our sympathy, and of the moral, religious, and intellectual light, as yet only twilight, that is beginning to shine upon them. It is pertinent to remark that Scamp is mentioned as one of the most prevalent surnames (p. 72) among the gipsies; but we know that a rose by that name would be none the less sweet. Whether there is any harm in gipsies as a body, decide who may; it is on record, however, that the "sudden appearance of swarthy gipsies over a wall made Van Tromp" (a famous race-horse) "stop so suddenly in a gallop that his suspensory ligament gave way." Still, any sudden apparition of anybody, gipsy or not, swarthy or not, might have had the same effect.

A very important work, one would be inclined to say, a work to be studied with attention and for instruction, rather than to be read for mere pastime and entertainment, entertaining as it undoubtedly is in parts, has been published under the title of Rome, its Princes, Priests, and People: by Fanny Maclaughlin (Elliot Stock), in two large volumes. It is a translation done from the Italian of Signor David Silvagni, author of a book about "Court and Society of Rome in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries." The Italian work has already, no doubt, attained the third and last volume whereby it was to be completed; and a translation of that volume also is promised, to be issued in due course, if the two volumes now offered to the public should meet with a satisfactory reception. It is to be hoped that this condition may be fulfilled. The translator apologises for the "great difficulty of rendering the little local allusions, plays upon words, and sarcastic remarks" contained in the "pasquinades, satires, and other verses" which have been translated; and, if there was little need of apology, the great difficulty, at any rate, must be freely acknowledged. For instance, when we read (vol. ii, p. 251) that a satire appeared about the great Cardinal Consalvi, containing certain lines which have been rendered into English, and of which "may Heaven save us, from a despotic man like Consalvi," is a portion so rendered, it is impossible, in the absence of the original Italian, not to suspect an employment of the verb "salvare" for a play upon the word "Consalvi," which play is almost entirely lost in the English, though "save" is certainly akin to salve. But such little losses are inevitable in translating from one language to another. It is another matter when (vol. i, p. 321) a translator produces such a grotesque hybrid as "The Prefect Consolare of Acquapendente," which is, no doubt, a mere hasty slip for "Consular Prefect." To English readers especially—for Rome has always had charms for English people—these graphic pictures of Roman life and Roman history, from a hundred years ago to a date within the experience of living men, with anecdotes of Cagliostro, Alfieri, and tutti quanti, cannot fail to be deeply interesting, and the forthcoming volume will be, if not of more, assuredly of not less interest. By-the-way, a list of the contents to be expected in that forthcoming volume is said to be inserted in an appendix, but is not readily visible to the naked eye.

Not many words can be necessary by way of welcome to Richelieu: by Gustave Masson (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge), which is a volume of the very commendable and commendably conceived "Home Library." The merits of the work, for which the author modestly claims no particle of originality, consist in the elaborate manner in which it has been put together, the succinct style in which the subject has been dealt with, the few notes and illustrative documents, the many useful "tables," chronological, genealogical, and other, and, lastly, the index, which, however, might perhaps have been more complete. The author or editor could not be expected to say anything very new about Richelieu; but he sums up the achievements of that great "mayor of the palace" with admirable force and brevity: Richelieu, he says, besides doing much for education, literature, and the arts, "left behind him an army which gave lustre to the early days of the new reign, a fleet quite capable of holding its own against the navies of Holland and of England, finances adequate to face not only the wars but the prodigalities of Louis XIV., agents equal to the task of administering a large and flourishing country, and around the Crown itself a prestige which not even the wickedness of Louis XV. and the incapacity of Louis XVI. could manage to destroy." In fact, the author or editor is half inclined to call the period, or more than half of the period, between the death of Henry IV. and the accession of Louis XIV. the "reign of Richelieu," not "the reign of Louis XIII." and few readers will wonder at the inclination. It has been doubted, nevertheless, whether Richelieu had genuine claims to be considered a financier, and it is supposed, not without reason, that he grievously oppressed the people.
